CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

SEVENTH CONGRESS. FIRST SESSION.

ought to be placed in the same category with Louisiana and Florida, but the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] are unwilling that my amendment be placed in the bill, and I know that I can not secure the passage of that amendment without their consent. Therefore I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand it, the section which was passed over on page 53 was read and is a part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has been read. By unanimous consent its consideration was postponed, in case there might be any amendment to offer to it.

Mr. BURTON. That is as I understood it. That makes it a part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is now a part of the bill in its original form.

Mr. BURTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the river and harbor bill (H. R. 12346), and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, they will be submitted in gross to the House.

A separate vote not being demanded, the question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to in gross.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SULZER. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker, on the final passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. [After counting.] Four gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are refused.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 22, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

LIGHT-HOUSES AT MOUTH OF BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3865) to establish light-houses at the mouth of Boston Harbor to mark the entrance to the new Broad Sound Channel.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established by the Secretary of the Treasury a first-order light and fog signal at the Northeast Grave, on a granite tower, built in the most substantial and secure manner and of sufficient height to allow the lantern a focal plane of 100 feet above high water, to mark the entrance to the new Broad Sound Channel, Boston Harbor, at a cost not to exceed $188,000; for the establishment of two range lights on Lovells Island, at the mouth of Boston Harbor, the rear light to be of the fourth order, on a tower about 45 feet above high water, and the front light to be of the fifth order, on a tower about 25 feet above high water, at a cost not to exceed $10,000; and for the establishment of two range lights on Spectacle Island, mouth of Boston Harbor, the rear light to be of the fourth order, upon a tower about 55 feet above high water, and the front light to be of the fifth order, upon a tower about 30 feet above high water, at a cost not to exceed $13,000, the entire appropriation for the five lights above mentioned not to exceed the sum of $211,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the construction of a light-house near the entrance to the new 30-foot channel leading from Broad Sound to Presidents Roads, in Boston Harbor. This channel is nearly completed, and it is expected that it will be open for transit this fall.

The light is to be built on what is known as the Northeast Grave. The whole course from Massachusetts Bay to and through the channel is beset with dangers on all sides. Ledges seen and unseen are only avoided by the most careful navigation. This light is absolutely indispensable at this point. To properly utilize the calm weather of the coming summer to build this light-house necessitates prompt action on the part of Congress.

The bill also provides for range lights on Lovells Island and on Spectacle, to insure the safe passage through the channel which is necessarily somewhat devious, and only 1,200 feet wide.

This bill is identical with H. R. 11472, introduced in the House by my colleague, Mr. CONRY of Massachusetts.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill 11472, on the same subject, lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill similar to the one just passed will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MONUMENT TO WILLIAM E. SHIPP AT CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration House joint resolution 155.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 155) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Charlotte, N. C., for the ornamentation of the public grounds in that city.

Resolved, etc., That permission be, and the same is hereby, granted the Shipp Monumental Committee, of the State of North Carolina, to erect a monument in honor of the late William E. Shipp on the premises upon which the public building and the United States mint are located in the city of Charlotte and State of North Carolina; said monument to be located under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the National Treasury and the chairman of the Shipp Monumental Committee; said monument to be presented to the people of the United States by the Shipp Monumental Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman the size or area of the grounds referred to in that resolution.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply asks the United States Government to permit a monument to be built on the public grounds in the city of Charlotte. I do not suppose it will take 8 or 10 feet square. It is a small monument the people of Charlotte, N. C., desire to have erected in memory of William E. Shipp, who was so highly complimented by General Wheeler for his gallantry at the charge of Santiago Heights.

Mr. MERCER. I am not discussing the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BELLAMY. Oh, the reservation. I suppose from my knowledge of it, an acre; a large piece of ground. I am corrected by some of my North Carolina friends, and should reply it is about an acre.

Mr. MERCER. About an acre.

Mr. BELLAMY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BELLAMY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LOAN OF TENTS TO KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS ENCAMPMENT.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11839) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at Knights of Pythias encampment to be held at San Francisco, Cal.:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to committee of citizens in charge of arrangements for the encampment of the Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, to be held in San Francisco, Cal., August 10 to 20, 1902, and deliver to Charles L. Patton, president and executive director of said committee, 1,000 wall tents, size 10 by 12, with poles, ridges, and pins for each: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of such property; the same to be delivered to said committee designated above at such time prior to the date of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and said Charles L. Patton, the number of tents so loaned not to exceed 1,000.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of line 3, page 2, add the following:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from said Charles L. Patton a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition; and the whole without expense to the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT OCRACOE ISLAND, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10983) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station on Ocracoke Island, on the coast of North Carolina.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station on Ocracoke Island, near Ocracoke Inlet, on the coast of North Carolina, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

SEC. 2. That the character of the equipments and appliances of the station and the station building shall be determined by the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER NEUSE RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

A bill (H. R. 12063) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Neuse River at or near Kinston, N. C.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—SPEARS AGAINST BURNETT.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take up the report 624, the contested-election case of Spears against Burnett.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine calls up the privileged report in the election case, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That N. B. Spears was not elected Representative to the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Seventh district of Alabama and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John L. Burnett was elected a Representative to the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Seventh district of Alabama and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Elections carefully considered this case and listened to the argument of counsel. While the Republican members of the committee found some things that they could not commend, we were satisfied that there were no such number of illegal or improper votes cast for the contestee as would change the result, and therefore the committee have unanimously reported the resolutions which have been read. I now move that the same be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions. The question was taken; and the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. POWERS of Maine, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—MOSS AGAINST RHEA.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged report on the House resolution No. 148, reported from Committee on Elections No. 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John S. Rhea was not elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Kentucky and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That J. McKenzie Moss was elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Kentucky and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, who desires to have read a substitute resolution.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution as a substitute, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. McKenzie Moss was not elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of Kentucky and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John S. Rhea was elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Kentucky and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi desires to ask unanimous consent that the substitute resolutions may be considered as pending. To that I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the substitute resolutions will be considered as pending.

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 1,000 copies of the river and harbor bill, passed yesterday by the House, be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think it would be well, Mr. Speaker, to settle in the order where they shall be placed for distribution.

Mr. BURTON. I take it that they will be in the document room.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not unless you make the order special.

Mr. BURTON. I have no preference of my own. The immediate object of this request is that the Senate committee may have copies before it so that they may take up the consideration of the bill promptly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They had better go to the document room, then.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask that they go to the document room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio couples with that the request that they go to the document room.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio will give me his attention, that some of the gentlemen around me think that the number had better be increased to 1,500 copies. There is quite a demand for the bill.

Mr. BURTON. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, and ask that the number be 1,500.

The SPEAKER. The request now made by the gentleman from Ohio is that 1,500 copies of the river and harbor bill be printed for the use of the House, the documents to be sent to the document room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—MOSS AGAINST RHEA.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending resolution may continue for eight hours without interfering with District of Columbia business on Monday, and that at the end of eight hours' debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the resolution and pending substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending election case shall continue for eight hours, not to interfere with District of Columbia day, which is on Monday next, and that at the end of the eight hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the original resolution and upon the substitute.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, coupled with that I think it is conceded that the vote will not be taken until Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. That is the understanding, and that would be the result that the vote would not be taken until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to couple that with the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MANN. I do.

The SPEAKER. And coupled with that request that the vote will not be taken until Tuesday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There ought to be a further agreement that the time shall be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. That will necessarily follow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Fox] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks further unanimous consent that the eight hours be controlled by himself and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Fox]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is never a pleasant duty to perform to attempt to remove from a seat on the floor of this body any person who has taken his seat. The Committee on Elections No. 1 has had no occasion for personal or political feeling either in favor of the contestant or against the contestee. This is the third term of Congress during which I have been compelled to do duty on that committee, and although it is a popular impression throughout the country, and often in legislative bodies themselves, that a committee on elections acts wholly from a partisan standpoint and solely for the purpose of protecting "our rascals," as the expression is sometimes used, I deem it proper to call the attention of the House to the reports which this committee has made upon election cases during the last three Congresses.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress there was referred to this committee seven contested-election cases. Three of these cases were abandoned, so that hearings were not had before the committee. In one of the cases—that of Aldrich against Plowman—the committee reported in favor of the Republican contestant and he was seated.

In three cases which were contested before the committee the committee reported in favor of the Democratic contestees. One of those cases was the case of Goodwyn v. Brewer—a hot contest, where the Republican members of the committee decided in favor of the Democratic contestee.

Another case was that of Crowe v. Underwood, from Alabama, where the committee again decided in favor of the contestee; and I have always been exceedingly pleased that we could find in that way since I have become better acquainted with the gentleman himself. In one of the cases then pending before the committee, the contest was from the same district, with the same contestee as the present case, that of Hunter v. Rhea; and, although in the Hunter case Mr. Hunter had been appointed to an office abroad, there came before the committee from Kentucky some of its most eminent lawyers and Republican statesmen, who urged the committee, upon the facts of the case, to find that Mr. Rhea was not entitled to the seat. But the committee then, because the case favored upon its merits Mr. Rhea, decided in his favor, without regard to the partisanship of the case.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress there were referred to this committee four contested-election cases. In one of those cases the committee decided in favor of the Republican contestant, Mr. Aldrich, who was seated from the district in Alabama. In one of the cases, which was from Kentucky, the committee decided in favor of the contestee, Mr. Turner, and against Judge Evans, the Republican contestant, who meanwhile had been appointed judge, but insisted that the committee should decide Mr. Turner was not elected. In one of the cases Mr. Davidson, of Kentucky, was the contestant, and Mr. Gilbert, my friend from Kentucky, who sits near me, was the contestee; and the committee again decided in favor of the contestee on the merits of the case.

In the most bitter case, I think, that has been before us—at least since I have been a member—we decided in favor of the Democratic contestee. I refer to the case of General Walker, the Republican contestant, against our friend Mr. Rhea of Virginia who now has a seat on this floor. If there ever was a case in which there was a chance for partisanship, it was that case. In that case for three weeks the committee sat and heard arguments upon the facts in the record, and at the end of that time, purely in the spirit of nonpartisan fairness, it decided in favor of the contestee.

There have been three cases before the committee at this Congress. The House has just passed a resolution favoring the seating of Mr. Burnett, of Alabama, although the contestant in that case, a Republican, urged before the committee, with all the force that he and his friends could command, that there was fraud in the case, and that the contestant, Mr. Spears, was fairly elected. But we decided, not in the spirit of partisanship, but in the spirit of fairness, that Mr. Burnett was fairly elected to the seat he occupies. In one of the cases at this session of Congress referred to us we have decided that neither the contestant nor the contestee is entitled to the seat.

I know it will be charged that in this particular case now pending before the House the committee has decided because of a bias. It is sometimes asked why in these cases the minority does not agree with the majority where the committee reports in favor of unseating the member. I have always taken the position myself, Mr. Speaker, that in a contested-election case, where the proposition is to unseat a member, the minority occupy the position rather of attorneys than judges, while the majority of the committee occupy the position of judges and not of attorneys, and that when the majority of the committee has decided in favor of unseating the member it is the duty of the minority to see that the question is properly argued in the House by making a minority report, so that no man can be turned out of his seat on the floor without an opportunity of having his case heard before the body which should act upon it.

So much for the record of the committee. In the case now before the House we have not determined it upon the basis of a fraudulent election. We have determined this case upon very simple grounds. We recommend to you the unseating of Mr. Rhea and the seating of Mr. Moss because Mr. Moss received, without question, more votes and Mr. Rhea received less votes.

At the outset of this case we were met with the proposition on behalf of the contestant that on the undisputed ballot he had received a majority of the votes. It seems that in the State of Kentucky the law provides that where the judges of election have any doubt with reference to the validity of a particular ballot, the ballot is preserved and returned to the canvassing board as a questioned or rejected ballot; and in this case the contestant claims that if these ballots were counted, as provided by law, where they were clearly subject to be counted, he would be elected on the face of the ballots; and the contestee claimed otherwise.

It happens that in the city of Bowling Green, Ky., there are six election precincts. In one of these 112 ballots were returned as questioned or rejected ballots; in other precincts various numbers; in Electric Light precinct 100 ballots were returned as questioned or rejected ballots, and the question before the committee was, as the question before the House now is, whether these ballots should be counted at all, and, second, whether if they were counted and considered the result would elect Mr. Moss.

I have here on my desk the original ballots, which I shall be glad to have members of the House examine. Under the law of Kentucky, which is the Australian ballot law, the marking of the ballot is made, ordinarily, by the use of a stencil stamp; and it happened that in this city and other places in the district the stencil stamp, which received its ink from an ink pad, was surcharged with ink from the ink pad, and when stamped upon the ballot and the ballot folded over, made a second impression upon the ballot.

It is as plainly to be seen as anything can be; it requires only the inspection of the eye to determine that the second mark upon the ballot is simply a reprint caused by the folding of the ballot by the voter over the original marking upon the ballot. It is perfectly evident that the second mark on the ballot was not put there for the purpose of identifying the ballot for fraudulent purposes, and it is perfectly evident that the second mark on the ballot was not made by the original stencil stamp. In some cases it was impossible for the committee to determine which was the original mark and which was the imprinted mark, and in those cases or where there seemed to be any doubt to the committee whatever we did not count the ballot.

Now, the law of Kentucky provides for the marking of these stamps by stencil. Gentlemen will notice that some of them are marked with a stencil cross and some of them are marked with the butt end of the stencil. The law says they shall be marked with a stencil cross, but the supreme court of Kentucky has decided that they may be marked with the butt end of the stencil, and when so marked in any way they shall be counted as valid ballots.

Mr. THAYER. How many were there of those you were in doubt about that you did not pass upon?

Mr. MANN. In the Electric Light precinct, which is one precinct, there were 7 ballots marked in the Republican circle and one other circle which we did not count, 4 ballots marked in the Democratic circle and another circle which we did not count. There were other ballots scattered from other different precincts, but, as a rule, the majority of the ballots which we did not count were marked in the Republican circle as one of the circles and not in the Democratic circle; so that by refusing to count those we did not give any advantage to the contestant, but gave an advantage to the contestee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we were determining this case the committee first, without determining whether the ballots should be counted as valid ballots or not, because there might be a difference as to one precinct or another precinct, appointed a subcommittee to examine the ballots and report upon the ballots from the various precincts which are in the record. That subcommittee called together the contestee, the contestant, and all the members of the committee, when the principal ballots in the case were counted—those from Warren County—and as each ballot was examined by all of these members who chose to look at it, a dictated statement was made to a stenographer, so that we all, or both sides, had a complete description of these ballots as they were in the record without controversy.

Subsequently the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and myself, who were the Republican members of the subcommittee, again went over these ballots. Subsequently, I think, Mr. POWERS went over them by himself. I know that I have been over these ballots two or three or more times, making minutes, to discover if there could be any question, by examining the particular ballot at different times, as to which was the original stencil mark and which was the imprint. For myself, in reference to a case of this sort, I may say that until the full statement of my opinion upon each of these cases—each of these precincts—had been footed up by my secretary, I never knew whether my conclusion seated the contestant or the contestee, the case was so close; because, in the first place, I may say that the contestee upon the face of the returns had a majority of 156 in a vote of nearly 40,000.

Upon the vote, as we make it in the House here, where we only count what we consider the undisputed result, we give the contestant a majority of only 21. It was so close that I was not willing to permit myself to be subject to the political bias of partisanship in deciding upon the question as to whether the particular ballot or the ballot from the particular precinct should be counted; and as I went through these ballots writing an opinion for myself upon the ballots from each precinct in question, determining in my own mind whether the ballots should be counted, and if so how many should be counted, I never knew until this had all been footed up by my secretary what the result would be; whether it would give Mr. Moss a majority or continue a majority for Mr. Rhea.

Various members of the House have now examined ballots which were returned from the Electric Light precinct No. 20, in Warren County, and I laid those ballots particularly open, because the minority of the committee in their minority report laid particular stress upon this particular precinct. In addition, Mr. Speaker, to the ballots which bear the impress, I desire to call the attention of the members of the House to another set of ballots which were rejected, and these last were all rejected in one precinct. When they went to count the ballots in this precinct, which is Police Court precinct No. 21, in Warren County, the clerk of the election called the attention of the judges of the election to a number of little pencil marks upon the ballot. These pencil marks are all different in shape, located generally in the upper right-hand corner of the ballot, but sometimes on other portions of the ballot.

They are of different styles, evidently all made with the same kind of a lead pencil—a soft, thick lead pencil—and usually a little mark, less than a quarter of an inch in length, probably placed there, undoubtedly placed there, either by accident or by design, by the election clerk himself, who called attention to them; and because these marks were upon the ballots the judges returned them as rejected.

I do not criticize the judges of election for doing this. The law forbids a ballot to be counted which has upon it a mark placed there by the voter for the purpose of fraudulent identification; and it may be very proper that the judges of election in deciding a matter of this sort offhand should say, "We have doubt whether these ballots should be rejected or counted, and we will send them up where they can be considered in proper order by a proper body."

This precinct, where these ballots are marked with a pencil, is the only precinct where we lay any stress on claims whatever upon the question of fraud; but it is perfectly patent that in this precinct the clerk of election committed fraud by making these marks upon the ballots.

Mr. FOX. I should like to interrupt the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. FOX. You will agree with me that there is no testimony as to who placed the marks on the ballots?

Mr. MANN. I will agree that there is no testimony as to who placed the marks upon the ballots, although the effort was made in the testimony on behalf of the contestant to show that the clerk of election did it. I do not think the evidence proves that fact. I do not think it is material as to who placed the marks upon the ballots.

What are the facts in the case? Under the Kentucky law there are two judges of election, a clerk, and a sheriff. The clerk of election handles the ballots; the clerk of election gives out the ballots to the voters; the clerk of election writes his name upon the back of each ballot as it is given out; the clerk of election has the ballots under his hand, with a pencil in his fingers, and in this case we must either presume that the clerk of election made these marks or that they were made for the purpose of fraudulent identification, and anybody who will look at the ballots can see that the marks are not made in such a way as to identify them at all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are Democratic ballots so marked, are there?

Mr. MANN. There were several Democratic ballots so marked.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Are they given credit for them?

Mr. MANN. They are not. They were all rejected in the record. Of course we have nothing but the rejected ballots before us.

Now, the law of Kentucky provides also that there shall be two stubs to the ballot, one on each end. Gentlemen will notice that on all of these ballots there is something torn off from each side. The ballots are sent out to the election precincts in a book form. There is a stub at the upper end of the ballot, and when the voter comes in to vote the clerk of election writes the voter's name, his residence, and the number of the ballot upon the proper stub of the ballot.

He also writes the voter's name and the number of the ballot upon the lower stub of the ballot. I speak of it as the "lower" stub. These ballots were illegally printed by a Democratic election commissioner, in violation of the law. The stubs should have been, one at the upper end of the ballot and the other at the lower end.

The voter then takes the ballot into the booth and marks it, folds it up, and returns it to the judge of election or hands it to one of the judges of election, who tears off the lower stub of the ballot, opens the stub, identifies the voter, and then deposits the ballot in the ballot box. I am not sure but that in this respect it is the most perfect election law I have ever seen.

In the city of Bowling Green—and this is a matter which was not dwelt upon in the contest before us—every ballot was printed illegally by the Democratic election commissioner. And I may say one of the tribulations and trials which a committee on elections has to undergo is that very seldom is an election case properly presented before us. The minority of this committee, in their minority report, quote certain sections of the Kentucky election law, although those sections had been repealed before the election was held and although the election was held under a subsequent act. Yet in the briefs presented to us, both on the part of the contestant and contestee, the matter is never referred to that a new election law was adopted only eighteen or twenty days before the election under which it was held. The brief of the contestee quotes the election law of the State of Kentucky, although that law had been repealed and the election was not held under it.

Now, the law which was passed in October, 1900, just before the election was held, provided that these ballots should be so printed that the stubs should be one at the upper end of the ballot and one at the lower end of the ballot, and not at the side of the ballot. We lay no stress upon this fact, except that this illegal printing of the ballots, in the form in which they were, by one of the Democratic commissioners of election in that county, who was a printer, is the cause of folding these ballots in such a way that the second imprint upon the ballot appears in another circle at the head of the ticket. If the ballots had been properly printed they would not have been folded as they were, so as to leave a doubt on 112 ballots in one precinct, on 100 ballots in another precinct, and on a large number in various other precincts.

This seems plain enough, and no doubt members of the House say, "Why, if that is the case, can there be any question about the results? Where does the contest come in?" I may say to you that the question is principally one of identification of ballots. The Kentucky law provided—the old law—that a ballot rejected or a questioned ballot should be returned in a sealed envelope with the election returns. Under the law as it existed prior to October, 1900, the ballots which were counted and not questioned were destroyed immediately after being counted.

Ballots which were not used were destroyed immediately after being counted. Ballots which were rejected or questioned were directed to be returned in sealed envelopes with the election returns. The act of October, 1900, passed a few days before this election was held, provided that the ballots counted and not questioned should be sealed up and returned in a sealed envelope, and sent inside of the ballot box to the county clerk; that the ballots which were rejected should be sealed in another envelope, in a linen envelope, sealed with sealing wax, with the seal of the county impressed upon the wax, with the names of the judges written across the flap, and that they should be returned to the county clerk as a part of the election returns.

The law also provides that judges may count ballots and return them as questioned ballots, so that the judges have the right to reject a ballot which is a questioned ballot and to return a ballot as questioned which has been questioned. The law provides that the judges shall return with these ballots a true statement showing whether they have or have not been counted, and if counted, for whom.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. As I understand, you have here before you all the ballots that were thrown out in the whole district. Am I correct about that?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Not thrown out.

Mr. THAYER. Not counted?

Mr. MANN. I do not think they are all here. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the ballots were all referred to in the evidence, but they were not all offered as exhibits, because of the fact that in some cases there was no question that the ballots were properly rejected.

Mr. THAYER. Now, as I understand, some of these rejected ballots have been counted for either one of these parties. Have you got those that you threw out and did not count for either? Have you got the number that you did not count for either here?

Mr. MANN. They are all here. We have the entire record here.

Mr. THAYER. Have you, by themselves, those that you did not count for either party?

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident that we have not, for all these ballots are bound by the Clerk of the House in these books. I would be very glad to show the gentleman some of the ballots in the record which we did not count.

Mr. THAYER. I think it being so close we ought to scrutinize each one of these ballots, and each member determine for himself whether it should be counted for either of the parties or not.

Mr. MANN. Why, of course, that is the privilege of the members of the House, and I would be very glad, indeed, to allow everybody else to examine these ballots for himself. I know that I spent three or four weeks of solid work in this case, and I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Massachusetts should take these ballots home with him and take the printed record and investigate all of these ballots. If he so desires it would be a pleasure for me to afford him an opportunity.

Mr. THAYER. I did not know but what the committee had done so, and that it could be easily referred to.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will read the report of the majority of the committee he will find the ballots referred to particularly from each precinct and a description given of every ballot which we count, and every ballot in those precincts which we do not count, and the reason for it.

Mr. THAYER. We might be better satisfied if we inspected them and came to our own conclusion. That is the point of my inquiry.

Mr. MANN. The ballots are practically all here for inspection, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman has been here for some time. If he finds an objection to the character of the ballots on inspection, he has the right to make that objection known. There is practically no difference about the character of the marks upon the ballots. It is true that a particular ballot might have a little stronger imprint than another, but the character of the ballot is the same through the district.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the reason they give in this case for not wishing to count these ballots is that under a decision of the supreme court of Kentucky they claim the ballots are not sufficiently identified. In a case in the Kentucky court of appeals it was decided in reference to these rejected ballots that they must be sealed up properly and accompanied with a proper true statement. And although this language was not necessary to the opinion of the supreme court in that case, we claim that we do not conflict with it in any way whatever, and I will read to you the foundation of the claim upon which the minority rests its case.

Referring to the statute requiring that a true statement shall be returned with the ballots, showing whether they have or not been counted, the Supreme Court says:

Moreover, section 1476 seems to prohibit such a statement being made upon the ballot itself as was done by the clerk in the case referred to. Consequently, the statement, in order to carry with it verity, must be made on a separate paper, signed by all the officers of election; and its relation to the particular ballot it refers to must be clearly shown by attaching them together, or in some other satisfactory manner, and sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the elections.

Now, the contestee claims that in this precinct where there were 112 rejected ballots, it was the duty of the judges of election to make separate statements and attach one to each one of the 112 ballots, stating that that particular ballot had not been counted. It must be remembered that the law of Kentucky provides no blank form for this purpose. There is no form sent out by the election officers to the election judges. The contention of the contestee is that it was the duty of the judges of elections, the mandatory duty of the judges of elections, to write out a statement, "This ballot was not counted," signed by each of the election officers, and in some way attach it to the ballot.

I may say, in passing, that it has been one of the things that I can not understand how marking a ballot on the back identifies it, but fastening a paper to it does not. The supreme court of Kentucky says you can not make this statement on the back of the ballot, because that is forbidden by the law which forbids making an identifying mark of any kind on the ballot. But you can put it on a separate piece of paper and attach that paper to the ballot. That is a distinction that requires the fine acumen of my friend from Mississippi or the gentleman from Kentucky.

We say in this case that the law has been complied with and that this decision of the supreme court of Kentucky has been complied with. The court of appeals of Kentucky said that this statement should be attached to the ballot or made in some other satisfactory manner, sealed up, and returned to the clerk of the county court. In each case where we have counted rejected ballots we have found in the record the return of the judges of election certifying to these rejected ballots, certifying to the number of ballots rejected, absolutely identifying the ballots from the time they left the judges of election until they appeared in the committee room here in the House.

Now, I call the attention of the House to what the judges of elections actually did do. The contestee claims that there should have been a statement attached to each ballot. The law does not so state. The supreme court does not so state. The minority of the committee selecting, I suppose, what they considered to be the strongest precinct in their favor in their report selected Electric Light precinct No. 20, and this is what the minority of the committee say:

There is not only wanting the certificate required by law to identify these ballots, but in some instances there is not even parole evidence offered to prove them.

It is alleged that 100 ballots were rejected at Electric Light precinct, Warren County; not one of the officers of the election at that precinct testified, and Edley, the Republican county clerk, testified, page 27 of the record, as follows:

"Q. How many ballots were returned, if any, from the Electric Light precinct, No. 20, and how did they come to your hands?"

"A. There were 100 returned by the election officers of said precinct in a linen envelope duly sealed."

And the minority of the committee further say:

It also appears from the return of the officers of election at this precinct, page 12 of the record, that there were 44 votes in addition to those cast and those questioned that are wholly unaccounted for by the testimony, and non constat that these were not a part of the ballots in the record.

They take this as their strongest case, Electric Light precinct, where we have counted the 62 rejected ballots for Moss and 26 for Rhea, rejected a portion of them, and they laid particular stress that in this precinct the ballots are not sufficiently identified by the judges, or in the case at all.

Here is the record. The record shows that the ballots were produced by the county clerk of Warren County, who testified that these ballots were returned to him by the judges of election; that they were opened by the board of election canvassers at the proper time, and that they had remained in his custody ever since; and upon this linen envelope in which these ballots were returned appears this indorsement: "None of these ballots have been counted for anyone," signed by all the officers of election, all four of them.

Now, the only trouble in reference to any statement is that the law provides that the questioned ballots which have been counted and the questioned or rejected ballots which have not been counted, but have been rejected, shall be returned in the same envelope, and without a statement it would be impossible for the election canvassers to determine whether a ballot which they found in the record subject to be counted had been counted or had not been. And that is the reason for having a "true statement" made.

But here is the statement on the outside of this linen envelope: "None of these ballots have been counted for anyone;" and that is signed by all the election officers. What sense is there in saying that these election officers should have been compelled to write out 100 of these statements—practically a physical impossibility—after the votes had been counted and the returns made out on the night of the election? How can anyone reasonably say that the ballots are not identified because each one of them has not attached to it a statement that that particular ballot had not been counted?

Now, that is not all. The return of the election officers from this precinct, as from all other precincts in the State where the law was complied with and where we have counted any ballots, sets out the number of ballots which have been cast, the number of ballots which have been counted, the number of ballots which have been rejected, the number of ballots which have been marked "spoiled," and the number of ballots which have been destroyed because not used. In the Electric Light precinct, which gentlemen choose to set out as their special precinct, the election officials returned the number of ballots counted as valid, 264; the number of ballots questioned or rejected, 100; the number of ballots marked "spoiled," 10; the total number of ballots cast (which of course did not include the "spoiled" ballots), 374.

Here is another absolute certificate that there were 100 rejected ballots—another compliance with and true statement of the law—that these ballots had been rejected—all of them.

Here are two statements, each not only a compliance with the law, but each a compliance with the decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky, that the "true statement" was to be returned sealed with the election returns. Each of these statements was returned with the election returns. One of them was the election return itself sealed in an envelope, and the other was the indorsement upon the other sealed envelope that none of the ballots had been counted.

I am perfectly willing to rest my case upon the question whether a general certificate, embracing all the ballots, is a compliance with the law, or whether the judges of elections must write out and attach to each separate ballot a certificate, although not required by law or by the decision of the supreme court of Kentucky.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this case which the gentlemen on the other side rely upon—the case of Anderson v. Likens—is not the only case which the supreme court of Kentucky has decided in reference to election matters. That case was decided by the court of appeals of Kentucky November 19, 1898; but in a case subsequently decided by the court, the court passed upon other ballots and came to other conclusions. In the case of Booe v. Kenner, which was decided subsequently to the case of Anderson v. Likens, the supreme court of Kentucky, while not referring to a description of the ballots themselves, while not deciding the points of law in the opinion, passed upon the ballots in this language:

In answer to this we will add that we have carefully examined the record and are satisfied that the decision of the county canvassing board in giving Dudley the certificate of election was right; that the intention of the voter can be determined from an inspection of several of the ballots rejected by the court below, and that on the merits of the case the mandamus should be denied.

Here was an expression of opinion that the Supreme Court had decided upon the record in the case of Booe v. Kenner, and that upon the merits of the case the court below was right.

Mr. FOX. Has the gentleman the original volume of that report?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who has the original volumes of any of these cases. I have not been fortunate enough to get hold of any of the court reports during the last week. I supposed the gentlemen on the other side had them.

Mr. BOWIE. The report has been in the possession of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH]. I handed it to him myself at his request.

Mr. MANN. I am not reflecting on anyone.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It can not be disputed that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] got it from me.

Mr. MANN. I have been chasing for these reports, and they seem to have been going round in a sort of merry-go-round.

Mr. Speaker, I had the original report. I had the original record from the clerk of the court of appeals of Kentucky. I know what the court decided because I have examined the original record of the case. I have the original ballots which the court of appeals of Kentucky said were properly counted. They were rejected ballots. There was no "true statement" attached to those ballots. The court of appeals of Kentucky said that they had examined those ballots and that they were properly counted; and in this case the county canvassers had counted 7 ballots for the Democrats and 2 ballots for the Republicans—rejected ballots—and that had changed the result.

I have the 7 ballots which were counted to change the result, which the supreme court of Kentucky said was a proper result. There is no "true statement" attached to any of these ballots. There was no "true statement," such as the gentleman on the other side of the aisle insist upon, connected with any of these ballots, and there are ballots in this case exactly like the ballots which we have in the matter pending before the House. Here is a ballot which I will defy anybody on the floor of this House to determine as to whether the original mark was made in one place or in the other, and yet the court of appeals of Kentucky said that it should be counted for the Democratic candidate for county clerk.

The gentlemen who are opposed to contestant make another point in this case: In each of the ballots in Kentucky there is a blank space below the name of the candidate large enough in which to write the name of another candidate, and there is a square opposite not only the name of the candidate, but a square opposite the blank space. It very often happens that the voter, in voting, marks his cross in the square opposite the blank space below the name of the candidate instead of in the square opposite the name of the candidate. In those cases in the pending contest we counted them, because the law of Kentucky says that no ballot shall be rejected where you can arrive at the intention of the voter, and we thought it clear that where the voter had marked the blank space below the name of the candidate, the two places being inclosed, he intended to vote for the candidate whose name was printed in connection with it.

At that time I had not seen the decision of the supreme court of Kentucky in the case of Booe v. Kenner, but in these original ballots, which the court of appeals of Kentucky said should be counted, there are several ballots, I may say to my friend from Mississippi, where the court of appeals counted a ballot where the only mark was in the blank space below the name of the candidate. I shall be delighted to present for examination to my hypercritical friends from Kentucky and on the minority these ballots passed upon as legal by the court of appeals of Kentucky, and let them reconcile the opinions of that court in accordance with their own suggestion.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to weary the House with these matters. I know very well that in matters of this kind the House must depend largely upon the opinion of the committee which makes the report. It is with that consciousness that the members of the Committee on Elections have attempted to decide this case fairly and impartially upon its merits, believing and hoping that whatever may be done with this particular case the members of that committee might merit and receive the confidence and approbation of their fellow-members on the floor of this House. Mr. Speaker, I would not for any consideration vote to turn a man out of a body which I believe to be the greatest body of men on earth if I thought that he had even a reasonable chance of doubt in his behalf.

The contestant in this case was a Republican candidate. I do not know whether he is a Republican or not. I do not care what his present politics may be. He had been a Democrat in former years. In the break-up of political alignment in Kentucky he became allied to the so-called anti-Goebel Democrats. I know not and I care not, so far as this contest is concerned, what his politics may be; but I thoroughly believe that he received a majority of the votes cast at the election, and although that majority is small it makes no difference in the chance and luck of elections whether the successful candidate receives 1 majority or 50,000 majority; he is as much entitled to his seat upon a majority of 26 as he would be entitled to a majority of 26,000.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have not referred to the Goebel election law of Kentucky, and it is not my purpose to indulge in any special comments upon that law, which did not affect and which does not control the method of voting in that State. This election was held while the Goebel election law was in force. The Goebel election law provided for the selection of three State election commissioners by the State legislature. It provided that these three State election commissioners should select three county election commissioners in each county. It provided that these three county election commissioners should select four election officers in each precinct, to be divided equally between the parties.

The only criticism I have to make in reference to that is that if you place the power of elections wholly in a partisan body elected by another partisan body, absolutely removed from local influences, and then provide that if these judges of election fail to perform the duties of their office you can not count the ballots on the one hand or prosecute the election officers on the other hand, then all hope of fair elections is forever removed. I make no claim that such action was taken in this case. I make no criticism on the precinct election officers in this case; but if the law provided, as contended in behalf of the contestee, that it was the duty of these election officers to attach to each of the rejected ballots in their precincts a separate statement, stating that these ballots had not been counted, then I say that it is placing upon election officers an opportunity such as they have nowhere else, and then I say it is the result also of partisan selection of election officers removed from local control.

Why, you can not prosecute one of these election officers for not attaching a certificate to each of these ballots. The law does not provide for it. You could not prosecute one. There is no evidence of intent to commit a crime. There is no evidence that the people did not intend to be absolutely fair. They complied with the law; they complied with the decision of the court; they complied with the statute, and if the law were otherwise they endeavored to comply with it. But suppose we say that it is the duty of the judges to do so and so, and the judges are all partisan judges, selected for partisan purposes, removed from local control, where the people of the county can not rebuke them in any way, and then say that they have the power to throw out all of the Republican ballots or all of the Democratic ballots in a precinct, and there is no way of getting at it.

The gentleman may smile at the idea of throwing out all of the Republican ballots in a precinct; but remember that in the one city of Bowling Green more than 300 ballots which are entitled to be counted were rejected by these judges of election, and probably rejected honestly. If they knew they had the power, without molestation by law, to elect a man to an office by simply saying, "There is a question about a ballot and we reject it," there is absolutely no security for honest elections.

Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad, if any member of the House wishes to ask any particular question in regard to this matter, to explain it as far as may be within my power.

Mr. PALMER. How did you identify the rejected ballots?

Mr. MANN. The rejected ballots, under the law, were inclosed by the precinct election officers in a large official linen bag, such as I show to my friend from Pennsylvania. This bag is an official bag, furnished by the county clerk. After the rejected ballots were placed in a bag, it was sealed with sealing wax, and the county seal is impressed upon the sealing wax in this case. It should be in every case. It is sealed across the flap and the names of the election officers written across the flap.

Mr. PALMER. That bag contains nothing but the rejected ballots?

Mr. MANN. This contains nothing except the questioned, rejected, and spoiled ballots. In this case which I refer to, and in every case where we counted any ballots, the certificates of the officers show that all of the ballots from that precinct were rejected, and that there were no questioned ballots. There are cases in the record where some ballots are rejected and some of the ballots are questioned, without a statement telling which of the ballots are questioned and counted and which are rejected, and in those cases the committee did not count anything from the precinct.

Mr. PALMER. Is there any evidence before the committee as to the reasons for which the judges rejected the ballots?

Mr. MANN. Oh, there was parole evidence, yes; but the reasons are quite plain upon the face of the ballots, I think.

Mr. PALMER. That was because the marks appeared in two circles?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. What did you do with the ballots that had the pencil marks on them?

Mr. MANN. We counted them. The law of Kentucky provides, not that a ballot shall be rejected if it has an identifying mark upon it, but that it shall be rejected if the voter, for the purpose of committing fraud, places an identifying mark upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is mistaken in that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I am not mistaken in the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The law will show.

Mr. PALMER. Was there any evidence in this case that the identifying mark was put upon the ballot by the voter, or was it in evidence that it was put on by the clerk?

Mr. MANN. The only evidence in the case was a sort of guess evidence introduced in behalf of the contestant for the purpose of showing that it was put on by the clerk, but the evidence did not prove that fact. There was no evidence tending to show that it was put on by anybody else, including the voter.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I made the statement, in contradiction of his statement, that where there was a distinguishing mark upon the ballot it could not be counted. The gentleman said that if the voter had put it on it could not be counted.

Mr. MANN. I still say that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I say if it is there at all, the ballot can not be counted.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I read from section 1570 of the election law:

Any ballot having any of the distinguishing marks mentioned in this section shall not be counted for any candidate voted for at that election.

If that is not as plain as a sentence can be drawn, I should like to know how it could be made any plainer.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly plain, and I will read to the gentleman what the section says. What the gentleman quotes is:

Any ballot having any of the distinguishing marks mentioned in this section shall not be counted.

Now, what the section says is:

If any person shall induce or attempt to induce any elector * * * to place on his ballot * * * any sign or device of any kind as a distinguishing mark by which to indicate to any other person how such elector has voted—

That is the section.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I agree that the section contains that language.

Mr. MANN. And it refers to a case where the elector places the distinguishing mark upon the ballot.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon—

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I can read. The section expressly says:

To induce any elector * * * to place on his ballot * * * any sign or device of any kind as a distinguishing mark.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That book you exhibit contains not alone the rejected ballots, but it contains those ballots that may have been questioned and counted. They are put in together. Now, I want to know how your committee distinguished the ballots put into these books that had been merely questioned and counted and those which have been rejected. You find in that book 20 ballots. Now, how can you tell which particular ones of those ballots were simply questioned and counted and which ones were rejected and not counted?

Mr. MANN. If a portion of the ballots were rejected and returned, I do not know how I could tell without a particular statement.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How, then, can you tell whether a portion had been questioned and counted or a portion had been questioned and rejected, or whether they had all been rejected? How can you ascertain that proposition?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to tell you how I arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I refer to Electric Light precinct, No. 20. That is a fair sample by way of illustration. Now, the precinct judges of the election, or the election officers, return in their statements the number of ballots counted as valid 264, number of ballots questioned or rejected 100, number of ballots cast 374. Now, it seemed perfectly evident to the committee that 374 ballots were cast, and 274 were counted, and 100 returned as questioned. Those 100 were not counted, and hence were rejected. Now, I do not know whether that is a correct conclusion or not; but it seemed to me just as patent as to say that one and one make two.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think the gentleman is very much in error. Let us see.

Mr. MANN. Well, let us see if I am mistaken; 100 and 274 make 374. I can understand nothing more clear than that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Listen, will you? The total number that is counted as valid is 274; the number of ballots questioned and rejected, 100. Now, you do not know how many of that 100 were included in those that were counted as valid.

Mr. MANN. Yes, I do.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How do you know?

Mr. MANN. We have here the statement that 374 ballots were cast, and they counted 274, and there were 100 they did not count, and they have so certified to that 100.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Then that 100 were questioned or rejected—questioned or rejected?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There are a number of them that were merely questioned, and counted in the 264.

Mr. MANN. What became of the other ballots?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is a question you will have to ask the election officers.

Mr. MANN. You wish me to impeach the returns? We take the returns.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. We accept the return of the election officers, which says that they had 374 votes cast. They have only counted 274, and they have rejected 100. Now, we find 100 here in the bag, which you contend are questioned ballots. You contend that they are questioned or rejected. But there were only 100 ballots there. If they were not all rejected, then the official returns of the officers are false.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. If the gentleman will permit me to suggest, the questioned ballots that are counted are placed in the box, to which each of the election officers has a key.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Only those that were counted are put in that book, and this report is made.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is to a certain extent correct and to a certain extent not correct.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is true.

Mr. MANN. All the ballots are counted. The questioned or those rejected ballots are sealed up in one envelope and put in the ballot box. The ballot box has two keys—one in the possession of one of the Democratic judges and one in the possession of one of the Republican judges—and it takes both keys to open it. Here, now, all the ballots were found, so that there were 374 ballots cast; 274 of those are counted as ballots not questioned.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They are counted as ballots. They may have been questioned, but they are counted as ballots.

Mr. MANN. Very well; 274 were counted as valid and 100 were not counted as valid, and that means that 100 were rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There is no statement in the certificate to that effect at all. There is 100 either counted or rejected.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; there were 100 rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. One-half of them may have been included in those counted.

Mr. MANN. It is a matter of arithmetic. If the gentleman says that a portion was included in the 264 counted, what became of the rest of the ballots?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not undertake to account for them. I am undertaking to show the gentleman that the general election certificate can not be made to take the place of a statement that our statute requires shall accompany the ballots for the purpose of identification.

Mr. PALMER. What is a questioned ballot?

Mr. MANN. A ballot that is counted and the validity of which is questioned by a judge of election. It may be counted by the election officers, but still it is returned as a questioned ballot.

Now, there are cases in this record where it is impossible to tell whether the ballots were rejected or whether they were questioned merely, and in this case we have not counted them at all. But it is as plain as that 1 and 1 make 2 that in this precinct the 100 ballots which were not counted were rejected ballots. That is a mere matter of arithmetic. In that particular precinct, and that is one which the gentlemen on the other side have dwelt upon most strongly in their opinion, and I call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a certificate over the signatures of the four election officers stating that not one of them had been counted for anybody.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not true that the ballots that were questioned and counted were deposited in the ballot box?

Mr. MANN. It is true that in that precinct there were no ballots questioned. If there had been ballots counted and questioned they would have gone with the rejected ballots, but the returns show that there were no ballots questioned and counted. The returns in other precincts show the same thing.

Mr. PALMER. What you want is to get an honest return?

Mr. MANN. Not so much an honest return as to find out who upon the record was fairly elected to the office under the Kentucky law and in accordance with the Kentucky statutes and the decision of the Kentucky court of appeals.

We have taken the court of appeals of Kentucky as a guide for determining the Kentucky election law, although we have never considered that we were bound, so far as the rule of evidence was concerned, by the construction of the Kentucky court of appeals; but, so far as the result is concerned, we have absolutely followed not only the Kentucky statutes, but the Kentucky court of appeals' decisions.

Mr. PALMER. Why did you not count the ballots not questioned and not counted for somebody?

Mr. MANN. Well, we find a case like this, for instance: We find a return like this in Logan County, and there were severe charges of fraud made by the contestant against the contestee's case in Logan County. If I remember rightly, the contestee's brother is one of the election officers in Logan County.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is an election commissioner, and has nothing to do with the conduct at the polls on election day.

Mr. MANN. Well, I call an election commissioner one of the election officers. But, as far as the case shows, there was no proof of fraud on his part at all. But this occurred: In a certain precinct, Ferguson, No. 10, the judges of the election made this return:

Number of ballots counted as valid .....	245
Number of ballots rejected .....	0
Number of ballots marked "spoiled" .....	0
Whole number of ballots cast .....	21
John S. Rhea received .....	168
J. McKenzie Moss .....	85
Total .....	253

So here was a case where they certified to 21 ballots cast and 245 as counted, and they made 253 votes for the two candidates for Congress. But we did not pay any attention to that case at all. I do not know but that we would have had an excuse for throwing out the returns. We found rejected ballots coming from that precinct, or what was claimed to be rejected ballots. We found ballots in the record there questioned, rejected, or spoiled, and we could not determine, and we did not attempt to determine which.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. The gentleman does not mean for the House to understand that my brother signed that certificate or was an election officer or in any capacity was present at that polling place?

Mr. MANN. I hope the House did not misunderstand me. I have not the slightest doubt that if the gentleman's brother had been an election officer the ballots would have been properly returned.

Now, there are other cases. We found a case at precinct No. 4, Logan County. In this precinct the election officer made a statement like this:

Whole number of ballots cast .....	357
Whole number of rejected ballots .....	6
Whole number of ballots marked "spoiled" .....	1

We find in the record, in connection with the envelope returned for precinct election officers, an envelope marked "spoiled and contested ballots," and in that we find 8 ballots. The record seems to show 3 ballots were counted by the precinct officers, and 3 not counted. It is impossible to tell which of the 8 ballots in the record, if any, were rejected ballots, which of them were counted, and which of them were not counted by the precinct officers, and therefore we counted not any of them.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. As I am reasonably familiar, I think, with the election law of Kentucky, the gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion. Take a precinct in which 300 votes have been polled. There are 100 of them questioned; but of those the precinct officers count 50. In their general statement or certificate they say that 250 votes have been counted as valid. The next item is questioned or rejected ballots, of which they say there were 100, which, added to the 250, would make 350 votes polled. That is the gentleman's method of getting at his result. The truth, however, would be that of the 100 questioned ballots 50 had been counted and included in the specification of the 250 votes counted as valid. That is the difficulty with the gentleman's method of computation.

Mr. MANN. In every one of these cases we have verified the number of votes counted as valid by examining the returns as to how many votes were actually cast for the different candidates. What the gentleman supposes to occur would be an absolute impossibility.

Mr. BURGESS. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The original ballots returned as valid are not in the record, are they?

Mr. MANN. Of course the original ballots are in the record.

Mr. BURGESS. Those that are here mentioned as returned ballots, are they in the record?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the original ballots which were counted as valid and not questioned are not in the record.

Mr. BURGESS. Very well; now, this was a general election, in which candidates for all offices were voted for. My question is this: The gentleman asserts that we can determine that certain ballots were rejected, because the returning officers recite so many questioned and rejected ballots; and then he claims that by the mere process of addition you can determine that all those were rejected. Now, I ask the gentleman how he can do that when he can not determine that the 100 ballots, we will say, counted as valid were any of them for Mr. Moss or Mr. Rhea, except the number recited, which in each instance is short of the valid number of ballots?

In other words, in a general election, a voter may have voted for county clerk and no other officer, for sheriff and no other officer. That ballot may have been counted as a valid ballot, and a questioned ballot may have been counted for Mr. Rhea. In such a case these returns will not demonstrate that it was a rejected ballot. Hence the gentleman's whole argument falls to the ground as not being consistent with the returns.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would not wish to say for a moment that the gentleman's arithmetic is not good, but I suggest to him that he examine the figures in the case. I have simply cited one case. They are all alike. In every case we have counted the ballots as plain as anything can be. Here are, we will suppose, 374 ballots on the table. The election officers lay aside 274 which they have counted and 100 which have not been counted for anybody. It is perfectly evident that if they have received 374 ballots and have counted only 274 there are 100 ballots which have not been counted at all. If the gentleman can not understand that arithmetic, I confess my inability to enlighten him on the point.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. If a ballot were cast for county clerk of Warren County and not voted in the Congressional race, would it not, under the Kentucky law, be mandatory upon the precinct election officers to certify that vote as having been cast as a valid vote?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. WHEELER. If in a general election some one voted for county clerk—

Mr. MANN. Certainly that would be a valid vote.

Mr. WHEELER. And would not the precinct election officers be required under the Kentucky law to certify that that vote was cast as a valid ballot and counted?

Mr. MANN. If the election officers counted it as a valid ballot, as they ought to do.

Mr. WHEELER. We presume that they did their duty. Then they will have to certify that vote?

Mr. MANN. Yes; as one of the ballots cast.

Mr. WHEELER. Then your record would show that among the ballots cast at this election was this ballot cast for county clerk, though it had no relation to the Congressional race?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Then will the gentleman explain, not as a conclusion, but as a matter of fact, how it happens that among the ballots certified as cast by the precinct election officers there were no ballots cast for county officers which were not cast in the Congressional race?

Mr. MANN. Quite to the contrary; I presume there were a number. We do not undertake to say anything of the sort. The figures that I have been referring to have nothing to do with the Congressional race. This does not mean that there were 264 ballots cast for Mr. Rhea and lost, or on Congressman at all. This does not mean and it does not say there were 264 votes cast for Congress, but that 264 ballots were counted.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit me just a little bit further? While that is entirely true, it is upon the hypothesis of the number of ballots utilized that you base your calculations in regard to the rejected and questioned ballots. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not say yes or no, because I do not understand what you mean. Suppose you elucidate further.

Mr. WHEELER. What I mean is this. You take the whole number of ballots certified as cast and the number of ballots returned as questioned or rejected, and upon the basis of the whole number of those cast and those returned you arrive at the conclusion that the ballots returned as questioned or rejected are the identical ballots; those returned now are the rejected ballots and all—

Mr. MANN. Why certainly we do not arrive at anything of the sort. We have the certificate. These ballots are returned in an envelope in a particular way to the county clerk, who states these are the ballots, and we have his testimony.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not mean that.

Mr. MANN. Then you misstate the question.

Mr. WHEELER. Perhaps I am not clear. Some of those ballots are returned as questioned and they may have been counted, and the gentleman arrives at the conclusion that these ballots returned as questioned have not been counted because, by adding the total number of ballots returned as questioned or rejected to the total number of votes counted he arrives at the conclusion that, as that tallies with the certificate of the counting officer, that was the total number of votes polled, and that therefore some of these votes questioned or rejected must be the same ones mentioned in the certificate and not counted.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has made a statement of his own.

Mr. WHEELER. Is not that correct?

Mr. MANN. That is not correct.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, then, I have been laboring under a misapprehension. I understood the gentleman to say to my colleague here that that was the way they knew these particular ballots had not been counted.

Mr. MANN. That is the way we determined that the ballots which are returned in the beginning in rejected envelopes have been rejected and not counted.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me put you a hypothetical case.

Mr. MANN. But the number of them is certified in the election returns.

Mr. WHEELER. Supposing there were 300 votes cast, certified to, and that there are three of those ballots cast for county clerk and not returned.

Mr. MANN. What do you mean by not returned?

Mr. WHEELER. Well, destroyed, because they were counted as valid.

Mr. MANN. That is where the gentleman is misleading. The gentleman ought to be perfectly familiar with the election law of Kentucky, but at the time this law was in force the ballots that were counted were not destroyed, and they are not destroyed now.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that perfectly well, but still those ballots that were not destroyed are not here before the House, nor are they questioned.

Mr. MANN. You state they were destroyed.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I retract that statement. They will be put in the ballot box; in other words, three of them will be put in the ballot box and then three ballots would be questioned but counted, and these ballots would be rejected and not counted, but the nine ballots would be returned as questioned or rejected. Now, will the gentleman state to the House how he would arrive at the conclusion whether or not those three ballots that were questioned were not counted or were counted according to his statement.

Mr. MANN. If there were 300 ballots cast?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the judges of election counted all of them but 6?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And returned they had counted 294 ballots, and the questioned and rejected ballots were inclosed in the same envelope? Without anything further we could not determine, and in such case we have not counted them.

If the judges of election have 300 ballots cast and there were 6 ballots which were not counted, and the 3 ballots which were counted and questioned and the judges of election made the return they had only counted 291 ballots, then we presume that all of the ballots in the envelope were rejected ballots, although it would be a false presumption, based on the false return by the judges of election; and we have not presumed in any case that the judges of election made a false return, because if you presume that there would be nobody elected at any time to any office in that State, and that, of course, we could not concede.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LACEY. Before the gentleman sits down I should like to ask for a word of explanation.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. LACEY. In some of these envelopes there were ballots returned that had not been counted, that had been rejected, mingled with others that had been counted although questioned.

Mr. MANN. There were a few such returns.

Mr. LACEY. And in those cases I understand you did not attempt to do anything. Because of the confusion of goods you could not separate one from the other.

Mr. MANN. In those cases we paid no attention to the ballots, and refused to consider parole evidence upon the subject.

Mr. LACEY. You accepted the return as conclusive?

Mr. MANN. We accepted the return as conclusive in every case, although I am frank to say that I have some doubt in reference to whether that would be the law or not; but we did not consider any ballot unless the return showed absolutely that all of the ballots in the envelope were rejected ballots.

Mr. BOREING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BOREING. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not a fact that there were very few ballots that were returned questioned and counted?

Mr. MANN. There were very few. There were some.

Mr. BOREING. Can you state how many?

Mr. MANN. That would be a guess, Mr. Speaker, and in an election case I am not willing to indulge in a guess upon any proposition whatever.

Mr. BOREING. The reason I ask the question is that I think your report shows that there are very few.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. It does show that there are a very few.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman sits down, I want to ask him a question as to a fact, because I think we ought to agree about the facts, and I have no doubt we will. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood the gentleman to say that no questioned ballots were considered in making up the report of the majority of the committee except those inclosed in an envelope bearing the statement that they were not counted, signed by the judges of election.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman misunderstood me then.

Mr. FOX. I must have done so, because I understood the gentleman to say that.

Mr. MANN. No; I called attention to the case which the gentleman of the minority selected as their battle ground in this case by singling it out in the minority report, and I referred to that case in full for the purpose of demonstrating the absurdity of the position of the gentlemen of the minority. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the position of the minority were correct, no man could ever expect, in the State of Kentucky, to be sure of an honest election, and that is a libel upon the State, which is not deserving of it, because the people of that State, in my opinion, as well as the people in other parts of the country, have no desire to take advantage of any candidate, or of any chicanery or fraud in the elections.

Mr. FOX. Will the gentleman allow me a question, because I am not going to make the mistake of arguing this case in the gentleman's time? I am going to wait until I get the floor before I make my argument, but I want to agree upon the facts. Is it not a fact that the envelope inclosing the questioned ballots from the Electric Light precinct is the only one that bears the statement, signed by the officers of election, that there were none counted? Is not that the only envelope of that kind?

Mr. MANN. It is not.

Mr. FOX. Then I will ask you, if you have it there, to refer to the envelope inclosing the questioned ballots for Kisters Mill precinct, No. 25, and see what the indorsement is on that; because I do not want to make any mistake about a question of fact.

Mr. MANN. I should be very glad to have the gentleman refer to it. I can not lay my hand upon it.

Mr. FOX. There is no statement upon that, is there?

Mr. MANN. I probably can tell that by referring to it. That is easy enough. It is very likely there is not.

Mr. FOX. Of course, we can differ about the construction of law, but we ought not to disagree about the facts.

Mr. MANN. Upon the ballot from the precinct which the gentleman cites there is an indorsement simply of the names of the election officers across the paster of the ballots.

Mr. FOX. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him just one more question? In reference to precinct No. 9, in Simpson County, I will ask him whether there is any indorsement on the envelope containing the questioned ballots from that precinct, and if so, what that indorsement is?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will have ample opportunity to lay this particular case before the House. He might ask me as to each precinct in my time.

Mr. FOX. That is the last question.

Mr. MANN. I will say very frankly to the gentleman, as I said before, in some of these precincts there is no indorsement, and that we never rejected any of the ballots in those districts.

Mr. FOX. You stated that you did not count any of those ballots where there was no indorsement.

Mr. MANN. I did not state anything of the sort. We did not count any ballot where the judges of the election did not certify showing absolutely by the certificate the number of ballots rejected, meaning that all the ballots in the linen envelope were rejected. But the gentleman chooses to say that we did not introduce parole evidence. In his minority report, in reference to Electric Light precinct No. 20, he says, "there is no parole evidence or other proof."

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have not to rely upon parole evidence to prove anything in this case except the identity of the ballots from the hands of the county clerk, who certifies to them, he being the legal custodian, and hence the gentleman thought to criticize us for not offering parole evidence in this particular case which is the only case he selects out in his minority report. I called the attention of the House to the envelope and the return from that particular precinct at length. If the gentleman wishes to change now and admit that the ballots from that particular precinct are valid, and take another tack, and write another report, and select another precinct, I am perfectly willing to go into the proof in the other precincts and show that there were sufficient grounds for our conclusion.

Mr. FOX. I will not follow the example you have in making an amended report that you brought in.

Mr. MANN. I have not brought in an amended report. If I have, I must have written it in one of my dreams, as Bryan speaks of Cleveland doing.

Mr. FOX. You certainly made two reports.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time to the gentleman from Texas as he desires; but before he proceeds, I will ask how much time has the gentleman from Illinois consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed one hour and forty-five minutes.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just addressed the House enters into some of the history of the committee of which we are both members with reference to its previous decisions in questions like this. Being a new member, and for the first time on this committee, I know nothing of its previous record, and, frankly, I care less.

I am not concerned as to whether the committee decided the previous cases correctly or not. I hope for its honor that it did. I am mainly concerned about how it is trying now to have this case decided. The gentleman speaks in defense of his purity of purpose; how he, together with his secretary, was so careful as to have these ballots all counted without knowing what the final cast-up would be in the case.

I am glad to see the gentleman so afraid of himself. It argues well for him, perhaps, in the future. But the question in this case—decisive, in my judgment, and upon which the minority feels certain the majority has blundered—is not one of count so much as one of legal import, as to whether any ballots in this record shall be counted or not. It is true we contend, and I think an inspection of the ballots will support that contention, that even if these ballots contained in the record are correctly counted, according to correct rules of law, and the results added to the official return by which Mr. Rhea occupies his seat in this House, that the result of these returns will not be changed.

But the first contention is in this case that none of these ballots contained in this record ought under law to be properly counted for any purpose in this contest. That question will arise, and I shall present it to you, upon the undisputed record which is before you. There will be no controversy between the gentleman who has preceded me and myself as to the facts; and he will be forced, or those who reply for him will be forced, to meet the fair legal question which involves the distinct proposition of whether or not this Congress will follow the statute and decisions of a State with reference to its elections, or whether both will be overruled by the committee of this House, contrary to the decisions and without a single one to support it.

I had intended briefly to cite the provisions of our Constitution and the decisions thereunder which define the boundaries of our power as a Congress to deal with Congressional elections in one of the States. The gentleman has frankly admitted that we are bound by the statutes of the State and the decisions of its supreme court construing them, and hence I regard it as unnecessary to consume time to demonstrate the wisdom and the correctness of that admission.

I will say, however, briefly, in the language of that splendid lawyer who wrote the minority report in this case, that the right to vote is not a matter guaranteed to any citizen in this country by the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress. It is a State privilege. The only provision of the Constitution which could attach to an election in one of the States is that which has reference to the color line, and that is not involved in the remotest degree in this contest now before the House.

The Constitution also provides that the members of the House of Representatives "in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." That provision is not involved at all in this case. The Constitution also further provides that "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." That provision is not involved in this contest.

Mr. Tucker in his work tersely and completely states this whole contention in the sentence when he says:

Suffrage is a State privilege belonging to State citizenship and is exclusively under State jurisdiction.

The minority report says:

The State of Kentucky has fixed the qualification of electors and has prescribed the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress. Although perfectly competent to do so, Congress has not at any time made such regulations or altered those made by the State of Kentucky.

Hence it follows this House is bound by the laws of the State of Kentucky and the decisions of her supreme court thereunder, and it is therefore perfectly obvious that the gentleman from Illinois admits the legal situation when he says this House is bound by the statutes and decisions of the State of Kentucky touching upon the manner and conduct of her elections, Congressional or otherwise.

Now, what is the real issue here between these two reports? Certain ballots are found in the record. The contention of the majority is that those ballots were rejected by election officials in the Third Congressional election district in Kentucky, and that here by this House, by this Congress, they should be recounted and the result added to the official returns. And by that process, taking the official returns, which gave Mr. Rhea the election by 156 majority, they add enough votes to Moss to bring him out 21 votes in the lead. Going through the whole record and counting all they could afford to count, scrutinizing it with all the labor and patience of the gentleman from Illinois for three weeks, as he says, they have added out of these ballots to the official returns enough votes to make Rhea 21 votes behind.

Now, I wish this House to carry that 21 majority, upon which the majority report stands, in its mind, for I intend to demonstrate, as I can as a lawyer, under the decisions of the supreme court, under the statutes of the State, and under the facts of this record, written down by the majority committee themselves, that there are more than enough votes in one precinct alone which they counted, that ought not to be counted, to change the result.

Now, in a general way I want to state so every man can understand the point about which we differ, the way elections are conducted in Kentucky in so far as they bear upon the points named in the discussion. They have there an official ballot. They are printed under the direction of the county clerk. They are required to bear a fac simile of his signature. They are sent out in bound books of various numbers in accordance, I presume, with the judgment of the clerk as to the size of the precinct and the number of voters that will need them. That ballot has on it different columns above which appear different devices. These devices indicate the parties for which the nominees thereunder are named, like the log cabin for the Republicans and the rooster for the Democrats, and something else for the Populists, and so on. Beside each name is a square in which the voter is to mark his choice, and also blanks where he may vote for some one else than any of the names for the particular office, if he sees fit.

A circle is under each device, upon which he may vote for the whole straight ticket by merely stamping in that. Now, the procedure in the election is about this: The election officers are made up of two judges and a sheriff and a clerk. The two judges are required to be of different political faith, and the sheriff and clerk are required to belong to different political parties, and there is no contention here but what these provisions of the Kentucky law were carried out in this case, and the two parties were represented. There is no necessity, no reason, for any fling being made with reference to fraud, because if one party was wrong the other was equally so, and it could not be charged to the Goebel law or its administration or to the Democracy of Kentucky that this or that failed to appear upon the ballots when they were returned.

Now, the voter goes to the clerk of the election when the polls are open, and the clerk takes the ballot upon which are two stubs. He writes the name of the voter upon one stub and the name of the voter on another, tears it in two between, hands him the ballot with one of the stubs attached, and the voter goes into the booth, and he marks it as he may see fit. He comes back with it folded so that nothing will be disclosed except the stub and the name of the county clerk, showing that the ballot is official. Then the judge of elections, not the clerk, takes that ballot, tears from it the stub, and deposits the ballot in the ballot box. Now, that is exactly the simple process of voting under the existing law in Kentucky.

And I pause here long enough to say that substantially those provisions have existed for years and years in Kentucky. The questions which arise in this case upon these two reports arise upon statutes more than twenty-five years old and that were not changed through all the Goebel period which is sought to be thrust into this case—I know not for what purpose—for no good one, evidently. Now, proceeding further, after the voters have all voted, then this is what the law requires: The judges and the sheriffs and the clerks—the whole body of election officers—are furnished with a blank return. And I call attention to the fact that the form of the return, to which this printed form furnished by the county clerk to the election officers conforms, is provided for in section 1483 of the statutes, as follows:

SEC. 1483. The form of the return to be made on the inside of the cover of the stub book shall be substantially as follows: State of Kentucky, _____ County, election held on the _____ day of _____, 18____, in _____ precinct. Number of ballots counted as valid, _____; number of ballots questioned or rejected, _____; number of ballots marked "spoiled," _____; whole number of ballots cast, _____; number of votes received for governor _____ by _____; number of votes received for lieutenant-governor _____ by _____ (and so for other State and county offices). * * * We, the judges, sheriff, and clerk of election at the precinct mentioned, certify that the above is a correct return of the election held therein on the day aforesaid. * * *

Now, that refers only to ballots about which no question arises—ballots against which none of the officers make any claim of invalidity. The statute continues:

That if there are any ballots cast and counted or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of election, said ballots shall not be destroyed, but sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted; and if counted, what part and for whom.

It must be quite clear, I think, to any lawyer that this section assumes that in these ballots which will not be included in the number cited in the returns as having been counted as valid there will be frequently some or all of the ballots questioned which were counted, but counted separately from the other ballots about which there was no question. It must also be clear to the legal mind that the returns provided for in one of these sections by the legislature which enacted both sections could not have been dreamed of as covering the "true statement" provided for in the other section. And when any man on the floor of this House contends that the correct legal construction of this section providing for returns is that the returns provided for may be taken as covering the "true statement" provided for in the other section to be attached to the ballots, he goes against every authority of any weight that has ever treated of statutory construction in this country or in England, and he would be ashamed to state that kind of a proposition before any respectable court—even the court of a justice of the peace in the State of Texas.

The familiar rule is that statutes upon the same subject are to be construed together, and that one is not held to cover the other completely, for such a construction would suppose a legislative body to be foolish enough to enact two statutes covering the same ground. These two statutes are to be treated as separate and distinct. Both statutes are mandatory in their terms, and they clearly, by any fair construction have not the same object in view.

Now, our contention is that this statute, which is mandatory and which requires that all the questioned or rejected ballots shall be returned to the election board accompanied with a "true statement" showing that they were counted or not counted, and if counted for whom, is to be applied to the facts of this case. It is admitted here that no statement of any sort is attached to any of the ballots that are sought to be counted by this committee.

The majority of the committee have been four weeks in going over and inspecting these ballots with microscopic eyes from A to Z, and in all their searching they found one bag containing some ballots which, on the back of the bag, said they were not counted. That is all they could find. There was nothing on the ballots themselves, mark you. There was no statement to identify them at all, and no man can say whether they are the ballots that were voted by the voters in that Kentucky election for Moss or Rhea or not.

Mr. FOX. There is nothing on the back of any of the bags except that from the Electric Light precinct.

Mr. BURGESS. And only in the one case from the Electric Light precinct is there on the back of the bag containing ballots any attempted compliance with the statute, and that does not state enough to identify anything.

Mr. FOX. In that connection, if it does not bother my friend, I want to call his attention to the fact that in many cases these ballots are not even identified as exhibits in this record. There is not a mark on them to identify them as part of the record whatever.

Mr. BURGESS. I will say for further explanation on that point that the only way that the ballots are attempted to be drawn into the record is in this way: The ballots returned are returned to the county clerk. The deposition of the county clerk is taken, and with reference to some of the ballots he puts a mark on them, and he certifies they were ballots in his office, identifying them as being in his possession; but that is not the question. We are passing upon the action of the election officials under this statute with reference to these ballots before they reach the county clerk.

It is when they are taken out of the box, when there is any question as to whether they were cast by voters or not. Then and there the election officials must identify the ballot about which there is a question and must affix in some way a statement to which they agree or disagree, so that there can not afterwards be any question about whether that was the ballot about which the dispute arose.

Mr. PALMER. Will you contend that each ballot ought to be indorsed with a statement?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir; no, sir. The gentleman misunderstood me if he drew any such conclusion as that. There never ought in any instance to be more than two statements, no matter how many ballots, and the statute clearly indicates it, because when the statute fixes here the penalty for putting a mark on the ballot, in brackets it expressly exempts putting a mark on the protested ballot, and the inference is clear that if there were 100 ballots here, part of which were questioned and part of which were rejected, and you and I were the election judges, that the simple way of complying with the statute would be to make two statements, attach all the ballots to one, and say these ballots were rejected and counted for nobody, and attach all the ballots to the other and say these ballots were counted for So and so or not counted for So and so.

That is the plain, easy way of complying with the statute. That is all there is to it. There is no difficulty about it at all, and all this fuss that is made in the majority report about the difficulty of complying with the statute and about attaching separate statements to each ballot, and that that would take a hundred statements written out and signed by all the election judges and attached to each one, is ridiculous. That is not my contention at all.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that that was the very contention of the contestee before the Committee on Elections, and that that is the reason that this appears in the report of the majority?

Mr. BURGESS. Well, sir, I would not undertake to give you reasons for what you say in your report.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Do you deny that he so contended before the committee?

Mr. BURGESS. I am not sure about that; I would not deny that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Do you not know that it was contended before the committee on behalf of the contestee that every separate rejected ballot had to have attached to it a separate and distinct certificate, certified by the officers of elections, showing it was rejected?

Mr. BURGESS. I think not. I think you misunderstood the gentleman. I do not think that has ever been the contention of my friend Mr. Rhea or his attorney. I do not see how it well could be.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You do not remember this being discussed before the committee?

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, yes; I remember its being discussed, like here. Mr. MANN ridiculed the idea, and perhaps you did too, and I agree with you. That is unnecessary and it is ridiculous.

Mr. MANN. I am glad you gentlemen have got to that point, at least.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. FOX. That is the point of the Kentucky statute that we are trying to speak about.

Mr. BURGESS. The question, however, was brought into this case by those on your side urging that the statute ought not to be complied with, and as a reason against it, saying it was impossible to be complied with, because it would require so many statements.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg your pardon, Mr. BURGESS; we never contended it should not be complied with.

Mr. BURGESS. Then you admit it ought to be complied with.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I admit that it ought to be complied with. I do not admit the same result follows that you claim if it is not complied with.

Mr. BURGESS. Very well; I understand. We understand each other, and I am glad the other gentleman [Mr. MANN] admits the statute ought to be complied with. With reference further to the identification of these ballots, it will be seen by reference to article 1476 that it is very plain. It reads as follows:

If any officer of election, or other person intrusted with the custody or control of any ballot or ballots, either before or after they have been voted, shall in any way mark, mutilate, or deface any ballot, or place any distinguishing mark thereon, either for the purpose of identifying the same (except by numbering protested ballots for future reference) or for the purpose of vitiating the same, he shall be guilty of a felony, etc.

Now, that, I take it, strengthens my contention upon the other two statutes, that the plain idea of all of them is that the election officers, when they act upon ballots rejected and questioned, shall make them up into two piles, so to speak, and attach to each a statement signed by all of them specifying whether they were counted or not and, if counted, how many and for whom, and identify them by number if necessary.

Now, if we were before a court that was blind to partisanship, blind to everything but a righteous decision of the law, it would be enough to read this statute and to read these Kentucky decisions, in my judgment, to end the case. This precise point has been before the supreme court of the State of Kentucky in two distinct cases, raised by the briefs of parties and upon precisely the record shown in this case.

I repeat that statement and challenge a denial from the gentleman who shall hereafter follow me, that this exact question has been before the supreme court of the State of Kentucky in two distinct cases upon exactly the record in this case, and in both cases decided in accordance with our contention. The first case that I shall read to you, decided as late as November, 1898, is the case of Anderson v. Likens, published in 20 Kentucky Law

Reporter, page 1001. I will read that portion of it which bears upon the question now before the court:

Of the whole number of ballots contained in the sealed envelopes referred to the lower court, upon appeal from the contesting board, adjudged that 15 be counted for Likens and 2 for Anderson. But it appears from an inspection of those ballots that none of them were accompanied "with a true statement as to whether they had or had not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom," as required by article 3, section 37.

Now, mark you:

There was no statement at all in relation to any of them except 5 or 6; and the statement as to each of them was not only meager, but was signed alone by the clerk of the election, and not all of them signed by him officially.

We think the statement should be full and complete, as required by the statute, and signed officially by all of the officers of the election. Moreover, section 1476 seems to prohibit such statement being made upon the ballot itself as was done by the clerks in the cases referred to.

Consequently, the statement, in order to carry with it verity, must be made upon a separate paper, signed by all the officers of the election, and its relation to the particular ballot it refers to must be clearly shown by attaching them together, or in some other satisfactory manner, and sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election. Questions as to the fitness of some of the ballots contained in the sealed envelopes to be counted and for whom counted were decided by the lower court, and have been argued by opposing counsel in this court. But as, for the reasons stated, none of them afford competent evidence of any fact, or can be considered for any purpose, we need not discuss or determine any question relating to the efficiency of any of them.

My senior colleague on this committee took the trouble to send to the State of Kentucky and procure the original record of this case, so that we might see whether the returns of election showed what they show in this case, and see whether there was any question about the decision being on all fours with the facts in this case. We have the record here. It shows a stronger state of facts to invoke this rule than is in the case before this House now. There is more of it in that record to identify the ballots, outside of the statement required by the statute, than there is in this case.

Not only that. This question was specifically raised before the court in the brief for the contestant. Not only that. This decision was rendered by a Democratic court, and the effect of it was to unseat a Democrat and to seat a Republican. That is the record of this case; and if I were disposed to appeal to your sense of justice on that side, I would say to you as honorable men and as competent lawyers, before you overrule a Democratic court that seated a Republican in Kentucky over the head of a Democrat, you Republicans upon the same state of facts ought to hesitate here to unseat a Democrat in order to seat a man who is only a pretended Republican.

This same question was before the supreme court in another case of later date than the one I read, a case decided in the December following the same year in which the other one was decided, a case in which precisely the same point was raised that we raise here and that was raised in the Likens case. Here is what the court say about it (Banks v. Sargent, 20 Ky. L. Rptr., 1049):

Appellant complains of the action of the contesting board and the circuit court because they refused to count certain ballots returned from precinct No. 5. The originals of these ballots are here, and are indorsed "This ticket was counted for all persons under the rooster and no one else. H. Banks, clerk of election precinct No. 5."

That was on the ballot in this case, and fixed definitely, exactly whom it was counted for, and in that case, if my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had been there, what a beautiful argument he could have made about the intent of the voter being plainly disclosed, and the ballot being perfectly identified by the statement on it in compliance with the statute and the signature of the clerk and the returns of all the election officers; and the speech that he made here if made there ought to have enlightened and opened up the brain of the judges of the supreme court of the State of Kentucky and led them to a different decision.

Here is what they say:

The exact indorsement is not on all the ballots, but they are similar. On inspection of the ballot, the cross is opposite appellant's name, which is under the "log cabin," and appellant contends that the votes so marked should be counted for him.

And the court on this finding held:

"The opinion in the Anderson v. Likens case, supra, also is conclusive of this point. The certificate of the clerk of election alone amounts to no certificate. In any event the certificate should not be on the ballot. It should be on a separate paper attached to the ballot, and signed by all the officers of the election. The ballots so certified can not be used as evidence of any fact, and they should not have been counted by the contesting board."

Mr. FOX. There is one suggestion in the case of Anderson v. Likens that I want to make to the gentleman. The ballots were accompanied by a statement signed by the clerk something more than these. They had no statement signed by the election officers.

Mr. BURGESS. I have stated to the gentleman that they were better identified in that case than they were in this, and I did not care to go into all the details. If any gentleman reads the record in the case of Anderson v. Likens he will see that they are much better identified than any of these are that the gentleman reports, and the only way the supreme court opinion can be dodged, the only way it can be obviated, is by arguing in a circle after a horse-mill fashion that the supreme court of Kentucky has not enough sense to read a plain statute and say what it means.

That is the only way you can evade it; and in effect that is what you do. In effect the majority's contention recites that "we believe, having great respect for the supreme court, that if we had appeared before it, with our logic and our brains, the decision would have been different." That was exactly the way it was written, and when I read it it makes me think of CHAMP CLARK's story about "gall," which I will not repeat.

Mr. MANN. May I call the attention of the gentleman to a statement in the report of the majority?

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN (continuing). In which we say that from an examination of the case the gentleman has referred to we are satisfied that the supreme court perfectly applied the law to the facts. That is quite contrary to the statement which the gentleman has now made.

Mr. BURGESS. I understand you to say that as a salve at the last, after the sore is opened. [Laughter.] It is like what you say when you turn John Rhea out with a certificate of good moral character.

Mr. MANN. Am I to understand that the gentleman is not willing that we should make that statement with reference to Mr. Rhea?

Mr. BURGESS. I have no objection to it. I think it is true, and it does me good to have you hit the thing occasionally.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman criticises us for making that statement.

Mr. BURGESS. Not at all; I simply use it as an illustration.

Mr. MANN. I take it as a criticism from the gentleman.

Mr. BURGESS. I use it as an illustration as to how you did in the other matter. When you want—

Mr. MANN. "How nice we can smile when we stick in the stiletto."

Mr. BURGESS. I will read what you say about the supreme court of the State of Kentucky:

We have too great a respect for the Kentucky court of appeals to believe that that court intended to aid in such a construction of the Kentucky statute.

You think they did not intend to say what they said because there can be no dispute that they did say that the ballots must not be counted unless attached to them is a statement as to whether they were counted or not; and if counted, how many and for whom?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want me to answer that now?

Mr. BURGESS. Is not that the language of the opinion?

Mr. MANN. That is not the language of the opinion. The language of the opinion is "attached or shown otherwise." The gentleman seems to have omitted the very express statement of the supreme court that there are two ways of showing, one by attaching a statement to the papers, or in any other satisfactory way which may be used.

Mr. BURGESS. I will read it to the gentleman:

Consequently, the statement, in order to carry with it verity, must be made upon a separate paper, signed by all the officers of the election, and its relation to the particular ballot it refers to must be clearly shown by attaching them together, or in some other satisfactory manner.

Now, the gentleman will not run counter to all the grammar he ever knew and say that a "satisfactory manner" only refers to the statement instead of the manner of its "relation to the particular ballot." Does the gentleman contend that the statement required by the supreme court is given in the record here? They had this case before it, and they say it must be attached to the particular ballot.

Mr. MANN. We claim that a proper certificate is here.

Mr. BURGESS. Can the gentleman show me any statement in the record which shows how many of any particular ballot was rejected or counted; and if counted, how many for whom? That is the kind of statement required by the court.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the supreme court of Kentucky and the State law did not intend to say, where they say the ballots were not counted at all, that they must publish a statement for whom the ballots were counted. I do not see how it is possible to say for whom they were counted if they were not counted at all.

Mr. BURGESS. You can not find the statement in the record that they were not counted.

Mr. MANN. The law says that a true statement must show whether the ballots have or not been counted, and if counted, for whom. We say the statement in the record before us shows that the ballots have not been counted; that is, a statement in writing signed by the officers of election in each precinct, sealed and returned with the returns of the election.

Mr. BURGESS. Very well; that precise statement in that case was in the Anderson-Likens case. That precise statement was before the court there. Not only that, but the returns which you call the statement is in the exact form of the statute, the form set out in the statutes, and the supreme court must have known it; so they could not in the Likens case have been overlooking your contention that it was a statement to which the subsequent statute refers. I am surprised that any serious contention should be made that the returns of the general election is the "statement" attached to the ballot referred to in the Likens opinion. The statute requires both, and the statement treated here, in the words of my friend, admits of no controversy.

Mr. MANN. I remember the language of the supreme court perfectly well, and if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that, like him, I have read the original record in the case and the briefs of counsel in the case, and I say the supreme court of Kentucky have never intended to make or hold such a doctrine as the gentleman claims, and in the record of that case and the briefs of that case the attention of the supreme court of Kentucky was never called to the certificates in the case and they never examined the certificates, and they did not know that they were in the record.

Mr. BURGESS. Just a moment in reply to that, because that constitutes a worse reflection than any the gentleman has before uttered; that brands every Republican lawyer in the State of Kentucky and the Democratic court as not knowing how to conduct an election case. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that he is the first man that ever raised this issue, although five or six cases have been ably represented by the best Republican attorneys in the party in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that was an issue?

Mr. BURGESS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that in the 51 pages of brief of counsel it is remotely referred to?

Mr. BURGESS. I do.

Mr. MANN. I will thank the gentleman to show it.

Mr. BURGESS. I admit that no reference was made by the court or any lawyers to the election returns under this statute as being the "statement" required. Why? Because nobody in Kentucky ever thought of it, be he Democrat or Republican. It took an election committee of this House to find out that simple difference.

Mr. MANN. I challenge the statement that there is a word in the 51 pages of brief of the contestee in that case which refers to this controversy at all in regard to the rejected ballots and the point the gentleman makes.

Mr. BURGESS. I will stake my reputation as a lawyer and an honest man that the straight-out point is raised every time in the Likens brief that these ballots ought not to have been counted because the true statement required by the statute is not attached. The gentleman admits it in his own report.

Mr. MANN. I say that in the 51 printed pages of brief of the contestee in the Anderson-Likens case there is not the remotest suggestion of it.

Mr. BURGESS. I am not talking about the contestee. I am talking about the man who raised the point, who was a Republican and represented by Republican lawyers, and the Democratic lawyers in Kentucky had the good sense not to make that contention. No lawyer on the Democratic side in Kentucky ever contended that the returns of a general election amounted to a true statement under this statute.

Mr. MANN. You claim that the Democratic lawyers filed 51 pages of briefs and did not refer to the contention in the case? I do not believe such a slander on the Democratic party.

Mr. BURGESS. For the simple reason that there was no way to meet the proposition under the statute, and the best that could be done, as every good lawyer knows, and what the gentleman ought to do is to admit that you are knocked out and quit. That is what they did. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no justice in this proposition in any fair court on earth. I will tell you that it is not a question of unseating John S. Rhea; it is not a question of seating Mr. Moss. This ruling and this majority report involves a great contention that will go further in innovation upon the rights of the State of Kentucky and its supreme court than any action of this House that has occurred since the war.

It means fairly and squarely whether the Committee on Elections can override and misconstrue and rip up the back the statutes and the supreme-court decisions of a State and be sustained in so doing by the House of Representatives. There is no escape from this question.

But I am not nearly through yet with this proposition. I am willing to meet the gentleman on his own construction of this statute and say there is absolutely nothing in this case and that no sensible man can vote to turn John Rhea out of this House on that kind of evidence. You may assume that the legislature of the State of Kentucky and the supreme court of that State were foolish enough to treat a general statement referring to no ballot as compliance with a statute which required a particular statement with reference to particular ballots as being questioned or rejected, and a particular statement as to how many were counted and for whom.

Why, sir, it took ingenuity to maintain that a general return can be treated as a compliance with that sort of a particular statute. There is not a lawyer on the other side but would be ashamed to write himself down as sustaining such a proposition. No wonder the gentleman wanted to talk about how fair the majority of the committee had been and how justly it had acted in reaching this result.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes, sir; as many as you please.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that, if the contention which he holds is correct, it would have been fair for the Kentucky law to provide a blank upon which these 112 returns, more or less, or any returns, might have been made by the election officers?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir; I think not; and I think the reason why a form for the purpose indicated by the gentleman is not furnished is perfectly clear. In this case, as in many other cases under the statute, blanks, as a matter of necessity, could not be furnished because there is so varied a state of facts in different cases that no blanks would serve the purpose. The officers would get into more trouble by undertaking to use a form in making the returns than if they simply followed their common sense. That is the simple explanation; and I ask the gentleman, if the legislature intended this return to cover such a statement as he contends for, why did they not provide a form for it in the statute? Let the gentleman answer.

Mr. MANN. They did provide the form.

Mr. BURGESS. I say—why did they provide a form for only that one return if they intended it to cover the other statements, the particular statements for which they did not provide—why?

Mr. MANN. They provided a form which we contend is sufficient. You contend that the judges of election should have written out a form for which the statute provided no blanks. We contend that the statute furnished a form for the blanks required—furnished all the forms that were necessary. You contend that the Kentucky law is defective; we contend that it has provided for the case in good faith.

Mr. BURGESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I believe this statute is one of the best I know of, and if rightly administered would unerringly produce accurate results, unless "monkeyed with" by an election committee. [Laughter.]

That is my judgment. I am trying to get the gentleman to see the absurdity of his contention. Here is a particular statute, requiring a particular measure, and the gentleman challenges me with the question, Why was not a form made out? And yet his contention is that a general statute which does lay down a form is to be construed as covering a statute which does not lay down any form.

Mr. MANN. There is no particular statute in the case; it is all one statute.

Mr. BURGESS. Well, the gentleman is getting very technical.

Mr. MANN. "Getting very technical!" I am taking the same identical statute—not the statute, by the way, referred to in the report of the minority.

Mr. BURGESS. I will ask you whether this language used by statute writers would not be regarded as a particular statute as against the general language of the other:

The ballots shall be accompanied with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted; and if counted, what part and for whom?

Now, if the gentleman does not understand the difference between a general and a particular statute, it will be impossible to debate with him further. The other statute refers to all elections and all returns and to no particular ballot. It lays down the form that all the election officers are to return from all the election precincts, without reference to any particular ballot. This statute requires the identification of particular ballots upon which the election officers take particular action, questioning some and rejecting others.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon one further remark and that will end this interruption by me. If he holds that a statute with reference to one return is a particular statute, and a statute with reference to another return, where it is the same statute, applying to the same officers and about the same matter, is a general statute, I do not understand his distinction, and I do not think there is any difference under the gentleman's own statement. Therefore, I say, I will not interrupt him any more, because he does not consider me intelligent enough to debate with him.

Mr. BURGESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is only an assumption like some of the gentleman's assumptions in his report—assumptions not supported by the facts.

Mr. MANN. My assumption was based upon the gentleman's statement, which, of course, on this matter, as on others, he did not intend anybody to take seriously.

Mr. BURGESS. Of course the whole body of this statute referring to the general subject of elections might be called an election law; but in speaking of two particular sections I still maintain that I am right, and I do not intend that the gentleman from Illinois shall get away from this conclusion by the imputation that I am asserting my knowledge as superior to his. Not at all;

I am not. He is older and smarter and better looking than the gentleman from Texas. I will make that broad admission, but in this particular case he is mistaken as to the law.

Mr. MANN. I said I would not interrupt again, but I can not permit a statement like that to go unchallenged, because it is not true in any particular or in the whole.

Mr. BURGESS. Well, I will except the good looks part of it [laughter], but I am going to let the balance go. Now I have said to you in seriousness, and I did not intend to get in the light of having a little circus and playing ringmaster to my friend from Illinois in the other character—that was not my purpose. I am serious, as earnest and as sincere as ever I was in my life, and I am willing to be written down in this record and confront for the next twenty years, if I should be so fortunate as to be reelected. I mean to make a record in this case of which I shall be proud when I am in my grave, and one of which I shall not be ashamed to have the greatest lawyer in this country say, "Here is the speech you made in a contested-election case; just read it and see what a miserable lawyer and quibbler you were."

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think they can read paper documents there?

Mr. BURGESS. Where? [Laughter.] I am not aware of where your intended future abode is, but I am sure they will read them where I intend to go. [Laughter.] Now, I have stated that I am willing to take the gentleman's position that the general return under the Kentucky law could be taken pro tanto, so to speak, as covering this true statement, and that still that would not help him, that still that would not justify the count in this record, that still that would not change the return of this vote.

Now, if you will follow me I will try and make it clear. For fear that the gentleman may think I misunderstand him when I attempt to state his statement on this floor, I will read it out of his report so that there can be no mistake about his position. Here is what they say with reference to this return. This is the way they attempt to identify these ballots and justify their count under this statute and under these decisions:

It seems to us quite evident that if for instance the precinct election officers in their certificate of election state that the number of ballots cast was 400, that the number counted as valid was 300, and that the number questioned or rejected was 100, that this is a sufficient statement to show that there are 100 rejected ballots not counted.

Now, if you will notice that, that is the meat of their case. Unless that is exactly true in fact and in law there is absolutely nothing in their report, and it ought not to be adopted. Practically they concede that. Practically they admit that the other evidences of identification of ballots under the statute would not be sufficient, but they say that this general election return which gives the number of valid ballots, the number of questioned and rejected ballots, the number of ballots cast, and the number of spoiled ballots, and the number of ballots furnished to the election officers by the county clerk affords five statements of arithmetic, from which it can be deduced that these ballots in this record were all rejected.

Now, I assert positively as a matter of fact that that is not true, and that they admit it in their own statement, and that the only question is as to how many of them it is true of. Now, these things need to be understood as bearing upon this proposition in mathematics, so to speak. If this had been, gentlemen, an election alone for Congress—Do you follow me?—if this had been an election alone for Congress and there had been only two candidates, namely, Mr. Moss and Mr. Rhea, then you could take the general return and concede that every voter there voted for Mr. Rhea or for Mr. Moss or did not vote for either—that is, that he did not vote for anybody else—you could determine whether a given number of ballots returned as questioned or rejected were all rejected or not.

But where, as in this case, there was a general election for all offices from constable to governor, including Congress, you can not take those figures and tell anything about whether these ballots that were in this record were counted for Mr. Rhea or for Mr. Moss or not. I mean from the returns, and upon that they must stand. For there is one box here alone—let me turn to it—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed one hour. Having unlimited time, the gentleman may go on; but it has been usual to call attention to the fact that an hour has been consumed. The gentleman may proceed if he desires.

Mr. FOX. I will yield to the gentleman as much further time as he desires.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BURGESS. To bring this down and try and get every one of you to see it, so that it can not be uncertain, I will ask you to consider with me just one election precinct upon which this committee has acted with reference to this particular question. I have stated to you that their report shows Mr. Moss was elected by 21 votes only. In this one precinct, Kisters Mill precinct No. 25, they increased Mr. Moss's vote over Mr. Rhea 51 votes. So that if they are wrong as to that one precinct, then

Mr. Rhea has still got 30 majority under their own report, without reference to all other questions.

Now, I want you to take their own report of how they identify those ballots under this statute. They admit there was not a single one of them signed by the election officials, nor was there anything on the bag in which they were contained which stated whether a single one of them had been counted or not, mark you. They were in a bag with no statement attached to them and there was nothing on the bag, so they admit in their own report, except that it had on the paper across the front, not sealed as the statute requires, not the signature of all the officials, but on a flap merely it had the signature of the election officers.

There was no statement on the bag or on the ballot as to any number of them, as to how they were counted, or for whom. So I have got here a case in which they added to Mr. Moss 51 votes, in which they must stand alone the doctrine of applying to this statute under these decisions the general election return and rely upon that alone to identify every one of these ballots as having been rejected. For unless it is certain that they were rejected, by what right will you recount them for Moss? If there is any question as to whether they were counted originally for Moss, by what right will you now recount them for Moss? And your whole right to count any one of them is and must be founded upon the righteous judgment that they were all rejected. There is no escape from that.

Now, you ask me to believe that because these returns show the number of ballots counted as valid, 257; number of ballots questioned or rejected, 112; number of ballots marked "spoiled," 3; whole number of ballots cast, 369; number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed, 64; number of ballots in this book, 436—you ask me as a reasonable man, as a man who is willing to decide the facts on his oath, to believe from that that those ballots were all rejected by the election officers and to recount them for Moss as they may show on their face. I say you ask me too hard a proposition.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LACEY. It seems that an amount equal to 50 per cent of the counted ballots was rejected; that is, that one-third of the whole was rejected.

Mr. BURGESS. About.

Mr. LACEY. How did it happen that such a large rejection occurred in that precinct?

Mr. BURGESS. Well, your question assumes more than I am willing to assume. There is no proof that they were all rejected.

Mr. LACEY. The return shows 112.

Mr. BURGESS. They may have been all questioned, and that is the point I am discussing now. How can you tell that the whole 112 were not merely questioned? They may have all been counted. How do I know that they were not counted? You say, "Why, because there are so many ballots counted as valid." Why, that would not include a ballot that was counted for a particular man but questioned. The "questioned" ballots and the "ballots counted as valid" must not be mingled together, under the statute. That is clear.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that if a ballot is counted as valid, but questioned, it is not included in the return of those counted as valid?

Mr. BURGESS. I think so, clearly.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought to read the Kentucky law.

Mr. BURGESS. That is a mere difference of opinion as to whether the gentleman from Illinois ought to know more about the Kentucky law. I say that this is clear. The number of ballots counted as valid refers to the ballots counted about which there was no question, and the addition shows it; for added to that the questioned and rejected ballots, the spoiled ballots, and the ballots left in the book makes the number of ballots sent out by the clerk. So I must be correct when I say that the first recital of the number of "ballots counted as valid" did not include a "questioned" ballot that was counted.

Mr. MANN. As valid?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So that the gentleman's contention is that a ballot counted as valid is not included in the number of ballots counted as valid?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes; that is exactly my position.

Mr. MANN. That is the position of the gentleman, which he rests upon.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That the certificate of the judges that they counted a certain number of ballots as valid does not include the number of ballots counted as valid?

Mr. BURGESS. The gentleman ought not to make a speech in my time.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to know what the gentleman's position was.

Mr. BURGESS. I will state my position so clearly, I think, that any man who has good common sense can understand it. Now, listen. I say that this number of ballots "counted as valid," in my judgment, does not include any "questioned" ballots which may have been counted for some one particular candidate, and the proof of that is that in each instance in these election returns the number of ballots counted as valid, the number questioned or rejected as a whole added together, with the spoiled ballots and the ballots left at the close of the election, added together, make the total number of ballots sent out in the book. So that it amounts to a demonstration that no questioned ballot is included in the number of ballots counted as valid.

Mr. BURLESON. That is a mathematical demonstration.

Mr. BURGESS. It is a mathematical demonstration.

Mr. MANN. That is what we think.

Mr. PALMER. The demonstration is the other way.

Mr. BURGESS. So that the only contention you have is to ask me to assume that all of the ballots returned by the election officers as questioned or rejected, how many of each I do not know and for whom I do not know—you ask me to assume that all of them were rejected, and I say you have no right to make that assumption. I say that half of them or all of them may have been questioned as to other officers and that they may have been counted for Moss. But you say that would increase his vote.

Mr. LACEY ROSE.

Mr. BURGESS. Just a moment, and I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

How frequently do we find, in red-hot Congressional elections, men who vote for neither candidate, and yet vote for candidates for county officers or for State officers. The returns show it. I have made a little table, and I will give you the figures without going into them minutely. These returns show that in the boxes that you counted there were 49 votes of those who did not vote either for Mr. Moss or Mr. Rhea, as shown by the mere subtraction of the total vote from the vote counted as valid. As shown by these figures in these precincts there were 49 voters who did not vote either for Moss or Rhea.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that the sum of 86 and 163 are 49? Because that is the gentleman's statement, and that is faulty arithmetic.

Mr. BURGESS. No; the gentleman simply misunderstands me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that in this precinct the number of votes returned for the two candidates for Congress were 49 less than the ballots counted as valid.

Mr. BURGESS. I did not intimate anything of the kind. I say that in this precinct there were 51 votes that you counted for Moss, and that was more than double the whole majority you give him. What I do say with reference to the vote is this: I was using 49 with reference to all the precincts that you set out in your report. Add them, and they show that 49 returned as valid votes by the election officers did not vote for either Moss or Rhea. That is the face of your returns. That depends upon how many questioned ballots were counted, that went in to make the aggregate and decrease the number of those that did not vote for either Rhea or Moss.

There may have been a hundred of them—I do not know how many—that did not vote for either Moss or Rhea. As to one of them the voter might say that he did not look upon him as a straight Republican, and as to the other, he might not like his Democracy. How many of this number were in the questioned ballots no man can now know, and it takes an election committee with a remarkable arithmetic to figure out all the rejections and add them to the election returns overturning the election of a Democrat and turning it on the side of the Republican.

That is the shape of it exactly. Is it really possible that any thinking man would contend that he can tell how many of these ballots were in fact rejected by the election officers merely from the face of the returns? Were there none questioned? If they were questioned were they counted? Who knows? How many of them were there? For whom were they counted? Who knows? Nobody but the gentleman from Illinois, with his fabulous intellectual process, could determine.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to answer as to who knows?

Mr. BURGESS. I shall not yield for an answer, because the gentleman has time in his own right, and while I would as cheerfully yield to him as to any other man on the floor, I prefer that he answer his own question in his own time and in his own way.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I simply wanted, Mr. Speaker, to show where the record answered the question.

Mr. MANN. He does not want it answered.

Mr. BURGESS. I guess the answer will keep. It will not spoil unless it is like some of the other remarkable statements that have been made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken longer than I intended to speak, but I desire that the House shall take these propositions of law and apply them to the undisputed facts in this case. There is no contention of any real dispute as to how these ballots are in the record, what they show, and what the facts are. And it is only a question of the application of the statute and two Kentucky decisions to these facts.

There is no need of talking about what the committee has done heretofore; no need to talk about the Goebel election law, or partisanship, or anything else, except the law in the case invoked by the undisputed facts; and it does seem, if this House would not get together on any question under heavens, of patriotism or of principle, we can afford one time to agree as lawyers as to what the law is and apply that to a certain state of facts.

Now, in conclusion, I press this matter, because I believe there are many fine lawyers in this House on both sides, and I do not desire to be understood as asserting that any member of this committee meanly or corruptly has reached the conclusion that he holds; not at all. But men are involuntarily and unconsciously biased, and especially so, unfortunately, in matters of religion and politics. The best of men who listen to a religious discussion generally believe their man at the other fellow up, and the tendency of this House has been on contested-election cases merely for each member to find out what side of the report he is on, and that settles the matter.

I say that this is a question of the highest right and the highest judicial opinion that you or I shall ever be asked to give; and in making our decision it is one in which we ought to remove far from us every partisan plea, one in which every principle of patriotism ought to well up in our hearts and say let us decide the real law in the case and preserve the real rights of States and the rights of individuals if the heavens and parties all fall into pieces. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I tell you it is a great question. If we shall set a precedent of winking at decisions and statutes of a State upon the free election of one of its citizens to represent her in this House, where shall we draw the line? If we set for once that precedent, when a time of excitement comes, when a time of partisan feeling may come, when there will not be the good era as there is now, men will be driven along and along and along until the rights of States and of individuals will be lost in a mere centralized power under the dictation of the men who are then running it.

I tell you I feel as if this case involved as much for the State of Kentucky as any of the great trials through which she has been called to go, and God knows they have been many and severe enough. I feel as if I would like to say to her, out of my heart, "I fear, thou grand old State, thou art about to be wounded in the house of thy friends."

"Surrounded by representatives of sister States whose stars blend with thine in the national flag, they are about to say that your Supreme Court decisions are of no value; that your statutes are meaningless, and that the election of one of your citizens can be determined by ballots not in compliance with the laws of your State or your court; that though you are gallant and brave enough to have men that would turn out on the same issue a Democrat and seat a Republican, that in a Republican House they are about to reverse the order of things and the decision of your higher court, and turn out a Democrat and seat a pretended Republican." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time the gentleman from Iowa would like?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not able to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] such time as he desires.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the history of the Kentucky election laws is a novel one in this country. From 1799 until 1891 elections took place in the State of Kentucky by a viva voce vote, and there was no ballot law in that State for any purpose. The constitutional convention which adopted the present constitution of the State provided that thereafter elections should be by ballot.

The following year a ballot law was enacted which I think is one of the best laws upon that subject ever written upon the books of any State of this Union. [Applause.] It was a law written with the benefit of all the experience of all of the States. Kentucky, the last to accept this system, was enabled by a comparison of the laws of other States to write upon her books a model upon this subject. That law has not been greatly modified since, but some changes were made in October, 1900, just before the election here in question.

In 1898 the legislature of Kentucky passed the so-called "Goebel law," and that law has something to do with this contest. It provided for the election by the then legislature of Kentucky of three commissioners, for their having the selection of the election commissioners in every county in Kentucky; and for the selection by the county commissioners of all the precinct election officers in the State; it provided for no division, politically speaking, of the members of these official bodies except in the precincts; provided that in the precincts there should be one judge from each of the two great political parties, and that the sheriff and clerk should be divided between the two parties, but, as the law provided, that the sheriff should be the umpire and should decide all disputes between the judges.

So that the county board was enabled to appoint one Republican judge and one Democratic judge, a Democratic sheriff and a Republican clerk, and could thus control the board of elections everywhere that it saw fit to control it.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Can I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will allow the gentleman to do anything he pleases.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I know the gentleman from Iowa does not mean to misstate the law, but the provision which provided that the sheriff should be the arbiter has existed in Kentucky for fifty years.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not intend to be understood that that was a part of the Goebel law. I meant to state that the Goebel law provided for the appointment of the local board by the county board, and the county board by the State board, and while it did require the judges to be of different political faiths, under the law the sheriff was the umpire to decide between them, and could, under the Goebel law, be a Democrat in every precinct. The gentleman does not dispute that proposition, does he?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I thought the gentleman from Iowa had fallen into the supposition that making the sheriff the arbiter was a part of the Goebel law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have not. Now, these judges and sheriffs and clerks, selected in the manner I have indicated, made up the returns from which this contestee claims that he was elected to the Congress of the United States, and he is now defending his seat chiefly on the ground that, as he claims, these partisans of his did not comply with the election laws of Kentucky so as to preserve the evidence of the rejected ballots. He is here insisting that these ballots are not identified under the laws of Kentucky by the election officers selected under the unjust Goebel law.

Mr. BOWIE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BOWIE. In the county of Warren, about which complaint is made as to the rejection of the ballots, is it or not a fact that both parties were equally represented at each election precinct in that county?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They were in every county in Kentucky, if the law was complied with, and I take it that it was.

Mr. BOWIE. If that is so, what was to prevent the Republican members of the precinct election board from making a certificate and calling on the Democrats to sign it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the question. It would not do a particle of good, because you say the law of Kentucky required them to be certified to by all the election officers, and you had the controlling factors of the board; you had one judge and the sheriff in each precinct.

Mr. BOWIE. One other question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOWIE. If the Republican members had signed such a certificate and the Democratic members, upon request, had refused to sign it, could not the Democratic members have been compelled by mandamus to sign it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I presume they probably could have been.

Mr. BOWIE. Was anything of that sort done?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think not.

Mr. BOWIE. Did even the Republicans offer to sign such a certificate?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In some instances the certificate is signed by a portion of the board.

Mr. BOWIE. By one clerk.

Mr. MANN. If I may be allowed a question, I would like to ask what would become of the ballots while a mandamus proceeding was winding its weary way through the courts?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The object of this law, according to the contention on the other side, is to identify these ballots; and if they are not identified from the very hour of the election the identification is worthless, as gentlemen well know.

Mr. BOWIE. If the ballots were taken into court they would be in the custody of the court, and would follow the mandamus proceedings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Did the gentleman ever hear of a court anywhere in the world taking charge of ballots pending mandamus proceedings?

Mr. BOWIE. I presume it has been done time and again in Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So many things have been done in Kentucky that it is possible this may have been done there, but I do not think it has ever been done anywhere else.

Mr. MANN. I assure the gentleman that such a thing has never taken place in Kentucky in any recorded proceedings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But I want to return to the case I was discussing. I have not here the law of 1900, but I have the law which is in substance the same as to the certificate to be attached to these rejected ballots:

If there are any ballots cast and counted or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of election, said ballots shall not be destroyed, but sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom.

There is not a syllable in that provision of law which says that this "true statement" shall be attached to the ballot.

Mr. WHEELER. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit, I should like to make a single remark with reference to the question just asked by the gentleman from Iowa, and the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that there would be something done in Kentucky with the ballots pending mandamus proceedings. I desire to say that there were mandamus proceedings in the city of Louisville in connection with the election of 1899, and the judges of the circuit court in that city (in some instances Democratic judges and in some instances Republican judges) were compelled to sign the returns.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No one questions that.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Illinois did.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all; he has not questioned it in the slightest degree.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to ask what would become of the ballots during mandamus proceedings?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. He simply wanted to know how you would identify the ballots after this long litigation.

Mr. WHEELER. No long litigation is required. In the case I have mentioned it took the court only three hours to determine the question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They have a summary way of doing things in Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. But a very honest way, though it may sometimes be a little mysterious to some gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. The question is how the ballots could be identified by a certificate of the court, which could not be had except at the end of mandamus proceedings, which might be weeks after the ballots had passed out of the hands of the judges of election. The ballots could not remain in the possession of the election officers; that is sure.

Mr. WHEELER. I presume they would go to the county clerk—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say the statutes in Kentucky did not provide that this true statement should be attached to the rejected ballots. But it is insisted that in the decision in the case of Anderson v. Likens the supreme court of Kentucky said that the certificate should be attached. When you come to examine the original record in that case you find there never was any argument before the court upon that subject; you find that the question never was discussed there, and you find that there is not a word in the statute saying that the certificate must be attached to the ballot. You find that it is a mere opinion of the court without any argument having been made upon the subject at the bar.

But suppose it be conceded that that is a fair construction. The court then says that the identification must be done by attachment or in some other satisfactory manner. In this case we have the identification in an entirely satisfactory manner, as can be shown to any fair-minded man.

This question was asked here this morning: If the returns should show 274 votes as valid and 100 votes as "questioned or rejected," how could you tell that there were not 50 "questioned or rejected" votes included in the 274 returned as valid?

Mr. FOX. Well, will my friend permit me—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Let me finish that statement. I will answer that question.

Mr. FOX. I have not asked you any question. Go ahead.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I mean the question propounded here upon the floor this morning; not the question by Judge Fox. I will answer that question.

Mr. FOX. I have not asked you a question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am answering the question propounded here before this morning.

Mr. FOX. But I have not asked you anything.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have repeatedly stated that I am not answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The gentleman declines to ask a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am answering the question propounded here this morning as to how you know that 50 of these 100 votes were not included in the 274. I want to answer that question. Because these returns, certified upon the honor of these reputable Democratic officers of election, state that the total was 374; and if 274 were counted as valid, and 100 were questioned or rejected, and 50 of that 100 were included in the first 274, then there were not 374 in the aggregate.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman pardon me—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I wanted to yield to my friend Judge Fox, if he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. FOX. I will ask you if the same certificate that you contend for is sufficient in this case, was it not in the case of Anderson against Lickens, and the court said it was not sufficient, for such a true statement as required by the statute must also be in the record.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will take pleasure in answering that.

Mr. FOX. Was not the identical general return in the case of Anderson against Likens in the record that is in the case of Moss against Rhea?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer that as best I can.

Mr. FOX. It is a categorical question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not want to answer it in a categorical way. I want to answer it in my own way, if I may have that privilege. This general certificate may be sufficient in some cases and insufficient in others, and I will show you how. If there were 250 votes—

Mr. FOX. Will you not answer the question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Let me proceed as I am.

Mr. FOX. You decline to answer it, then?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I do not. You will be fully answered in a moment.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman listened to me this morning, I answered the question, and he ought to be satisfied.

Mr. FOX. Will you not admit that return is in the case of Anderson v. Likens?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In the same form?

Mr. FOX. Yes; in the record.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In the same form?

Mr. FOX. In the same form—in the statutory form.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will admit—

Mr. FOX. Made out exactly according to the blank that is set out in the statutes of Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will admit that it appears in Anderson v. Likens in the same form, but not in the same relation to the facts in the case; and now, if the gentleman had waited, I would have explained that a moment ago. If the record shows 250 votes counted as valid, and it shows that there are 50 questioned votes included in that and 50 rejected votes, and the 100 questioned and rejected are bunched together in the same canvas bag, there is no method of distinguishing which were questioned and which were rejected.

Then this general certificate is not sufficient to comply with this provision of the statute to which the attention of the House has been so often called this day; but if the record shows that the votes that were counted as valid, added to those that were both questioned and rejected, makes the exact aggregate number of votes cast in that precinct, then it conclusively appears, if the certificate be true, that every ballot classed as questioned or rejected was, in fact, rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman's argument would be true if there was but one race in which balloting was being done, but in this particular case the citizens of Kentucky were voting a blanket ticket for everything from constable to governor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am glad that you asked me that question.

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad you gave me the opportunity to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I might have overlooked that if you had not asked me.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to direct your attention to this point, that if 10 voters had cast their ballots for county judge, those 10 ballots would have been certified to as cast, while 10 of the ballots that were returned as questioned might have been also counted in the Congressional race, and offset those that were counted only in the county judge's race in footing up the total amount of ballots passed.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will try to answer that. The law of Kentucky, as you know, provides that the ballots for the precinct shall be bound in a book.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And it provides that the judges and other officers of election shall account for every ballot that they receive in that book, does it not?

Mr. WHEELER. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is true. When they come to make up this statement we are talking about, it is not a statement of votes cast for candidates; it is a statement of what became of the ballots in that book, and you know it.

Mr. WHEELER. That is just exactly right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And they state that of the ballots in that book—400, for instance—200 were counted as valid.

Mr. WHEELER. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That 150 were rejected or questioned, and 50 were destroyed because not used.

Mr. WHEELER. But if my friend will permit me, if a ballot is cast for only one man and it is a legal ballot, it is counted in the sum total as a good ballot, and you can not tell whether it has been rejected or counted in the Congressional race, in the Presidential race, or in the county race.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. A ballot is either good or bad as a whole ballot. It may be that a voter has failed for some reason to vote for some one candidate.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And he may have voted for other candidates; but the ballot as a ballot is either a valid ballot or not a valid ballot.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree entirely to that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And it is so reported by the election officers of the precinct.

Mr. WHEELER. And it is for that reason that we contend that when you take the total footings that may have been cast for one candidate or a dozen candidates, upon which to hypothecate this calculation, and show how many of those ballots were questioned and rejected or questioned and counted, it is absolutely fallacious, because you are assuming that every voter in Kentucky voted the entire Democratic or entire Republican ticket.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg your pardon. I am simply turning to these returns, which show there were a certain number of votes counted as valid, and a certain number counted as questioned or rejected, and a certain number that were not used, and the aggregate equals the total number of tickets furnished to the judges of the precinct. And therefore I say those thus reported as rejected or questioned can not have been counted as valid or the statement is false.

Mr. FOX. Before my friend proceeds, will it bother him for me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It does not bother me at all, except that it uses up my time very rapidly.

Mr. FOX. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman for that reason, and I have refrained heretofore; but suppose that the return from the Electric Light precinct, for instance, shows that there are 100 questioned or rejected ballots. Admitting that that is sufficient to show that there were 100 rejected ballots, for the sake of argument, how does it identify the rejected ballots?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not say it identifies the rejected ballots.

Mr. FOX. Wait a minute. The contention is on our side that the true statement required by the statute to accompany rejected ballots is necessary to identify the rejected ballots, not to show how many there were, but that without that true statement being made there is nothing in the record to identify the rejected ballots. It is true, perhaps, that the general returns show that there were 100 questioned or rejected ballots; but where are they, and how are you going to find out what they are? What points to them, what identifies these ballots in the record as the rejected ballots?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The law requires them to seal up those rejected ballots in a canvas sack, does it not?

Mr. FOX. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And as a matter of fact the officer to whom these ballots were returned by your Democratic officers swears that these are the ones they did return as the rejected ballots.

Mr. FOX. It was not a Democratic officer. Mr. Edley was a Republican officer.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not say that the witness was a Democrat.

Mr. FOX. Then I want to call your attention—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I said the custodian who received them from your Democratic officer swore that the ballots he received are the ones which are here.

Mr. FOX. I say Mr. Edley swore, and he is the only man that knows anything about it, that he was the custodian, and he was a Republican officer; and there is nothing on these sacks, except the one from Electric Light precinct, to identify them as coming from anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not say that the county clerk was a Democrat.

Mr. FOX. They are just dumped into this record without any sort of mark to identify them. They are not even identified as exhibits by the commissioner who took the depositions.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I say the clerk, the custodian of those ballots, testified that your Democratic officials turned them in as rejected ballots.

Mr. FOX. No; he did not.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the effect of his testimony.

Mr. FOX. Well, as you read it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; as I read it. Now, I have said something about this Kentucky statute and something about the decision of the supreme court of Kentucky. I claim, first, that under the statute, and then, second, I claim under the decision of the supreme court, these ballots are admissible; and I claim they are admissible even in defiance of the statute and in defiance of the decision of the supreme court of Kentucky. I propose to put it on both grounds, and I feel that it may be well to read even to our Democratic friends the provisions of the Constitution of the United States upon this subject.

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Does that provide that the legislature of any State can prescribe the rules of evidence which shall govern this judicial body in sitting and trying contested-election cases? Does the Constitution, when it says—

That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, confer authority to enact rules of evidence for the Government of this judicial tribunal?

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Is this House, sitting in the exercise of its high judicial functions, to be bound and limited by rules of evidence derogatory of the common law enacted by the legislature of the Commonwealth of Kentucky? I want to read an authority upon that subject. This is from George W. McCrary, of Iowa, who was once chairman of the Committee on Elections of this House. His work upon the subject of elections is certainly the most able, the most learned, and the most scholarly of any text-book upon that subject in the English tongue. He made a report to this House upon the very subject now under discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What page do you read from?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is the case of Norris against Handley, from the Third Congressional district of the State of Alabama, reported in Smith, page 73, the portion of it I desire to read:

The statute of Alabama, defining the powers and duties of the board of county canvassers, or supervisors of elections, provides as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of elections, upon good and sufficient evidence that fraud has been perpetrated, or unlawful or wrongful means resorted to to prevent electors from freely and fearlessly casting their ballots, to reject such illegal or fraudulent votes cast at any such polling place, which rejection so made as aforesaid shall be final unless appeal is taken within ten days to the probate courts."

The gentlemen say that merely the failure of the judges of elections of Kentucky to certify is final to this House, unless an appeal is taken to the court of Kentucky upon mandamus.

Another section provides that this "board of supervisors of elections" shall be composed of the judge of probate, sheriff, and clerk of the circuit court in each county.

In the opinion of the committee, it is not competent for the legislature of a State to declare what shall or shall not be considered by the House of Representatives as evidence to show the actual votes cast in any district for a member of Congress, much less to declare that the decision of a board of county canvassers, rejecting a given vote, shall estop the House from further inquiry. The fact, therefore, that no appeal was taken from the decision of the board of canvassers, rejecting the vote of Girard precinct can not preclude the House from going behind the returns and considering the effect of the evidence presented. From this evidence we conclude that box No. 1 was improperly rejected by the board.

That report was adopted in this House, and I am a little surprised to see our Democratic friends are taking a contrary position. I want to read a little more from the Constitution of the United States:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The Constitution thus confers upon the State, as an entity, the absolute power to choose electors for President and Vice-President; and yet twenty-five years ago, when the Republicans were insisting in a Presidential contest that the Congress could not go behind the face of the returns from a State, our friends set up a cry of fraud and insisted that Congress had that power. How does it come, as we had the right, as you said then, to go behind the returns to say who were chosen electors for President and Vice-President for the whole State, that we are to be bound absolutely by the rules of evidence of the States in determining who has been elected by the people of a State to a seat on the floor of this House?

Mr. FOX. Does my friend think that the regulation of a statute requiring a certain certificate to accompany the ballots is a rule of evidence?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. You say that the court can not entertain any evidence except that prescribed by the law of Kentucky. That is a part of your contention; that it is simply a rule of evidence. I say that it is a rule of evidence, and perhaps more than a rule of evidence. I say that you propose to nullify the election by a law of the State which you claim fixes and limits the evidence identifying the ballots, and I insist the Constitution never conferred on the State authority thus to govern and control this House in the exercise of its judicial functions.

Now, as a matter of fact, this whole election was in the charge of the partisans of this contestee. They conducted the election; they made the returns. We have got here what his partisans returned as rejected ballots. They show that he was not elected a member of this House. And we have produced the evidence of the custodian who received these ballots directly from his partisans appointed under the Goebel law, that law which was repealed before the election, but which the legislature deemed it wise and expedient to keep in force until after the election, providing that the repeal should take effect after this thing had been consummated.

Now, assuming, then, first, that we have complied with the Kentucky law, second, that if we have not complied with the Kentucky law, if we have identified these ballots, that is all that is necessary under the Constitution, I pass to a brief consideration of this case on one or two other propositions involved.

It appears that these Goebel law officials systematically passed out the ballots without the initials of the clerk on them. Then they took them back and put them in the ballot box, and then when they came to count the votes rejected them. It is now contended that because the law said the ballots should not be deposited without the initials of the clerk, that that was a proper exercise of the power of the election boards.

I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the overwhelming weight of authority is that where a law provides that a ballot under certain circumstances shall not be counted, that is mandatory; where the law provides that under these circumstances it shall not be received, it must be counted if it is received. This very question was recently before the supreme court of the State of Missouri, and I call attention to the opinion of that court in the case of Hehl against Guion, 55 Southwestern Reporter, page 1036, in which the court specifically lays down the proposition that where the law provides that without the initials the ballot shall not be received; if it is received, the voter can not be cheated of his right of suffrage by rejection of the ballot after its receipt. Numerous authorities are collated on the same subject and on the same side.

Mr. FOX. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. FOX. Has not another branch of the Missouri supreme court decided exactly the opposite?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; before this case.

Mr. FOX. About the same time?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just before this case; and that was a minority decision, and this was the majority of the court.

Mr. FOX. It was the full court, but a different branch of the supreme court.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon—

Mr. FOX. There are several branches of the supreme court.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I know there are several branches, but this decision that I refer to was a four-judge branch and yours was a three-judge branch. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOX. This was an appellate division.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; but this was a four-judge division and yours was a three-judge division. Yours was the first case and this was the last case. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOX. This was not the last case. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The last case from the court on that subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to further discuss the rejection of these ballots where they appear here in these volumes from page to page. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has ably presented that subject. It is a fact that has been called clearly to the attention of the House that there was no candidate for Congress upon these tickets upon which the blots were made.

Even if there had been a specific cross on the Republican ticket and the Social Labor ticket, under these circumstances, under the weight of authority, the ballots should have been counted for the contestant and not thrown out. The weight of authority is that where a man marks two ballots, under the Australian system—two tickets—that he does vote for all such candidates as are running for office where there is no candidate for the same office upon the other ticket.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman about the law, especially upon further investigation of it. But the gentleman understands that in figuring the majority of 21 which the committee reports, they did not include these ballots, and if we did include them, it would make the majority considerably larger.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am well aware that they were not included. The truth is that in this case if the ballots were counted—as they should have been counted under the weight of authority—if in this case we had been able to go into the precincts where the certificate was not full enough by lack of evidence indicating how many had been rejected, the majority of the contestant would have been several times what it is by the report of the committee. But absolutely every ballot has been rejected by the committee where it was not conclusive that the contestant was entitled to have it counted in his behalf.

This Kentucky legislation provides for a system of ballots with two stubs, and it provides that the last stub shall be detached by the officers of the election after the vote has been prepared by the elector. In a number of instances the stub was not thus detached as required by the statute; and the judges, having neglected their duty in this respect, rejected the votes, thereby benefiting this contestee. But the same authorities to which I have already referred hold that ballots of that kind must be counted. That has been the principle governing cases of this kind—that where the voter has on his part complied with the law, the judges of election can not by their misconduct in depositing his ballot without the preliminary steps having been taken, defraud him of the right of suffrage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this case so far as I intend to do. I believe the evidence abundantly shows the election of this contestant; and while I have the utmost regard and respect for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Rhea], my colleague upon the Committee on Banking and Currency, I trust that he does not want to sit here as the beneficiary of a system under which, according to his present contention, these ballots were first unlawfully excluded by the judges of election, who then, as he contends, failed to furnish the statutory evidence of that fact. I trust that the gentleman from Kentucky would not be willing, as the result of such a proceeding, to hold the seat to which Mr. Moss was justly elected by the people of the Third district of Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, wait a moment.

Mr. MANN (after a pause). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to close up this matter for to-day?

Mr. MANN. We are through with the discussion for to-day.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARTHOLOTT, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present certain resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts relative to the feasibility of constructing a canal between Weymouth Fore River and Taunton River. I ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the year 1902. Resolutions requesting Congress to provide for an investigation by the United States Government of the feasibility of constructing a canal between Weymouth Fore River and Taunton River.

Resolved, That the general court of Massachusetts requests that the Congress of the United States shall take such action as will provide for an investigation by the United States Government of the feasibility of constructing a canal from Weymouth Fore River to Taunton River, by way of the city of Brockton, in this Commonwealth, and for a report thereon, to be made as speedily as possible to Congress.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and also to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted March 6, 1902.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 11, 1902.

A true copy. Attest:

WILLIAM M. OLIN,

Mr. MONEY. I present a petition of certain editors of newspapers in the United States, praying for the defeat of the Henry oleomargarine bill and for the enactment of the Wadsworth substitute instead. I ask to have the accompanying petition, together with the names, printed, and that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule prohibits the printing of the names.

Mr. MONEY. I know that. I am asking unanimous consent that it may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the petition be printed—

Mr. COCKRELL. As a document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Together with the names—as a document or in the RECORD?

Mr. MONEY. As a document.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a large number of names?

Mr. MONEY. There are probably 50 names.

Mr. SPOONER. Why should the names be printed? Does the Senator care for that?

Mr. MONEY. I care for it. That is all there is to it. The petition sets forth their objection, and without their names it would not be valuable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that it be printed as a document and not in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Winthrop Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Winthrop, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was ordered to lie on the table.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. DUBOIS. I present a memorial of the American Chamber of Commerce of Manila, suggesting needed legislation for the Philippine Islands, which I ask may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

The American Chamber of Commerce of Manila—A memorial to Congress suggesting needed legislation for the Philippine Islands.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The American Chamber of Congress respectfully represents to your honorable body—

That the following legislation for the Philippine Islands is urgently needed:

For the sale and settlement of the Government lands, under laws as may be enacted by the Philippine Commission, to American citizens, and to those who have declared their intention of becoming American citizens.

That the United States mining laws be extended to the Philippines.

Laws facilitating the cutting of timber on the public domain for at least fifteen years, under such terms and restrictions as now are, or may be imposed by the forestry bureau, for the prevention of the denudement of the forest reserve.

For the immediate provision of the granting of franchises for the development of the islands and their resources.

For the immediate passage of laws for the admission of cool labor, as the native labor is inadequate and insufficient for the development of the resources of the islands.

That the coastwise shipping laws of the United States be extended to the Philippine Islands.

That free trade be established between the United States and the Philippine Islands. We are convinced that the competition of Spanish merchandise in the Philippines is not to be feared by importers of American goods. In case of a possible deficit in the customs receipts caused by the free admission of American and Spanish goods, this chamber urges a uniform tax on real estate and personal property sufficient to meet the requirements of the administration.

For the adoption of an uniform staple currency for these islands.

For internal-revenue laws on manufactured tobacco, spirits, and malt liquors in these islands.

That a free zone be established in Manila, so as to make Manila a distributing point for produce and manufactured goods, thereby enabling the merchants of Manila to compete with the free ports of Hongkong and Singapore.

That the Philippine Commission be increased to 10 members and that the two additional members be Americans of commercial and industrial experience.

If Congress will enact laws as indicated, this chamber is convinced that the army in the Philippines can be materially reduced within a very brief period of time.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each member of Congress.

Adopted at a full meeting of the American Chamber of Commerce held on the 6th day of February, 1902.

F. E. GREEN, President.
ROGER AP C. JONES, Secretary.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Philippines. I wish to call attention to the significant fact that this is the second memorial presented through the Chamber of Commerce at Manila insisting that the restrictions in regard to Chinese coolie labor shall be removed. The whole testimony before our committee goes to show that we can not develop those islands without Chinese labor, and this is the second unanimous petition upon that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, is the question of reference debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that petitions and memorials shall be referred without debate, but Senators very frequently violate the rule.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask from what persons the petition comes. Is it a petition from citizens of a foreign country with whom we are at war or is it a petition from persons for whom we are at present the Government?

Mr. DUBOIS. The memorial is from the American Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. Are they American citizens?

Mr. DUBOIS. I understand that they are American citizens.

Mr. HOAR. I want to know, Mr. President, if I can, whether these petitioners are a people with whom we are at war. I hear of criticism of various members of this body and other people—a criticism I have not myself escaped, although I have not any complaint to make of it—that some obstruction is placed in the path of our military authorities in carrying on war. I wish to know whether the Senate thinks we are carrying on war. We can not carry on war, I suppose, against anybody without an act of Congress, but certainly we can not carry on war without an act of Congress against our own citizens or subjects. Whatever act of force, whether civil or military, can be conducted by the Executive of its own authority is for the sake of keeping or restoring the peace as a police power.

I should like to know whether in criticising such things for one I am criticising acts of force against American subjects, which I suppose are lawful subjects of criticism, or whether I am talking about my country in a state of war against a foreign country. We can not under our rules accept petitions from citizens of any foreign country.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. "Of a foreign power."

Mr. HOAR. Well, it is the same thing, I suppose, whether it is a foreign power or a foreign weakness. I think the reception of this petition for reference, to which I certainly make no objection and for which I shall vote if I have an opportunity to vote on it, is an admission by the entire Senate that we are not engaged in war, and I shall govern myself accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial is referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

POST-EXCHANGE SYSTEM.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have here some letters, press extracts, resolutions, etc., concerning the improvement of the post-exchange system in the military establishment. It will be a short document and very interesting, and I should be glad to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to have it printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3519) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Cummings, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 1378) granting an increase of pension to Bessie H. Lester;

A bill (H. R. 8212) granting a pension to Alice Angel; and

A bill (H. R. 6873) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Maley.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1154) for the relief of certain owners and occupants of land in Monroe County, Ark., reported adversely thereon.

Mr. BERRY. This bill was introduced by my colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas]. He is not present in the Senate. I should like to have it placed on the Calendar until he returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4339) authorizing the White River Railway Company to construct a bridge across the White River in Arkansas, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4080) to correct the naval record of Daniel W. Blake, United States Marine Corps, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4222) authorizing the appointment of John Russell Bartlett, a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, reported it without amendment.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF ARIZONA.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print from stereotyped plates 500 additional copies of the report of the governor of Arizona for 1901, and to deliver the same to the Department of the Interior for its use.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 21) authorizing the printing of extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, to report it back and recommend concurrence in the amendment of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read. The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the word "one," insert "from which shall be omitted all illustrations."

Mr. PLATT of New York. On behalf of the committee, I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES O. JONES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 20th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of $100 be paid to James O. Jones, from the contingent fund of the Senate, for preparing the index, tables of contents, and briefs of the testimony taken before the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals at the present session of the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC ISLANDS AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. FORAKER on the 20th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with bills pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use; and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 4679) granting an increase of pension to Griffith T. Murphy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill I present the petition for increase of pension of Griffith T. Murphy, with affidavits of Dr. G. W. Fitzpatrick, Dr. John R. Lewis, Dr. P. C. Jones, and Dr. R. S. Tenney, Mrs. A. J. Leilly, Ambrose Dale, and Sarah Dale, Harry L. Ferguson, and Dr. H. A. Grossman. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $155,200 to pay to the estate of Eli Ayers, deceased, the amount paid by the said Eli Ayers in his lifetime to the Chickasaw reserves for 194 sections of land in the State of Mississippi, which land was afterwards appropriated, sold, and disposed of by the United States without regard to the rights acquired by the said Eli Ayers, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana submitted amendments proposing to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River from $600,000 to $650,000; to increase the aggregate amount which may be expended on the improvement of that river between the points mentioned from $1,800,000 to $1,900,000; to increase the limit of the amount that may be expended in any one year on the improvement of the said river between the points mentioned from $600,000 to $650,000; to increase the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, official, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission, from $2,000,000 to $2,250,000; to increase the aggregate amount which may be expended on the improvement of the said river between the points last mentioned from $6,000,000 to $6,750,000; to increase the limit of the amount that may be expended in any one year on the improvement of said river between the points last mentioned from $2,000,000 to $2,250,000; providing that of the money appropriated for the improvement of said river between the points last mentioned $50,000 shall be expended at Greenville, Miss., $20,000 at Helena, Ark., $20,000 at New Madrid, Mo., and $20,000 at Caruthersville, Mo.; providing that the expense of operating dredges between Cairo and St. Louis, on the Mississippi River, shall be charged to the fund appropriated for the said river between Cairo and the mouth of the Missouri, and proposing to appropriate $110,000 for continuing the improvement of the harbor of New Orleans, La., $50,000 for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Natchez and Vidalia, Mississippi and Louisiana, $25,000 for rectification of Red and Atchafalaya Rivers, Louisiana, and $70,000 for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Memphis, Tenn., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $225,000 for the rectification of the Stockton and Mormon Channels at and near the city of Stockton, Cal., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of special agents in charge of divisions in the rural free-delivery service from $2,400 to $2,500, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

VIEWS OF MINORITY ON SHIPPING BILL.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That 2,000 extra copies of Senate Report No. 201, part 2, being the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce on the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries, be printed for the use of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Fisheries be, and is hereby, directed to examine into the destruction of sea fish along the eastern coast of the United States by persons engaged in fishing with dynamite and other explosives, and to report to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, as to what remedy lies in Federal legislation upon the subject.

WHALING AND SEALING CLAIMS AGAINST RUSSIA.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the State Department 200 extra copies of the Document S. 62, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, being a report by the Third Assistant Secretary of State on the whaling and sealing claims against Russia.

SPANISH TREATY CLAIMS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of the claims which he is now defending before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, giving in each case the number, the names and residences of all the claimants, the citizenship, whether native or by naturalization, the ground of the claim, the place where the injury was done, and the amount claimed in each case, with a statement of the gross amount of all the claims; and also to transmit to the Senate copies of the petitions in each case where $1,000,000 or upward is claimed.

PERSONS IN CLASSIFIED SERVICE FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a list of persons now holding places in the classified service charged to the State of South Carolina, giving names, present address, legal residence, when appointed, and amount of salary in each case.

HERBERT A. BOOMHOWER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4821) granting an increase of pension to Herbert A. Boomhower, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. HALE. If morning business is over, let us go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair first lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. 12346) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). The Committee on Commerce desired me to say to the Senate that hearings would commence on the bill known as the river and harbor bill to-morrow morning at half past 10; that Senators would be heard to-morrow morning, Wednesday morning, Thursday morning, and Friday morning, and after that there will be no further hearings. They requested me also to ask leave of the Senate to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the act (S. 3312) for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 3261) authorizing the Eldorado and Bastrop Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Ouachita River, in the State of Arkansas; and

An act (S. 3267) to change the boundaries between the southern and central judicial districts of the Indian Territory.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. HALE. It is now something more than an hour before the expiration of the morning hour. If we go to the Calendar, I think we may clear it off again, as we have done before, and I hope that will be done. I shall object to any request for consideration except in the order bills are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar will be announced.

JOHN L. SMITHMEYER AND PAUL J. PELZ.

The bill (S. 167) for the relief of John L. Smithmeyer and Paul J. Pelz was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over, objection being made.

Mr. STEWART. It went over without prejudice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It went over without prejudice.

ASSAY OFFICE AT PROVO CITY, UTAH.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask that the bill (S. 150) for the establishment of an assay office at Provo City, Utah, which was temporarily passed over, be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been read in full as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When that bill was before the Senate heretofore the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made some remarks about it, and I do not know whether he is now ready for its passage.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no report accompanying this bill, and so I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it is recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over for the day, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make a brief statement about the bill, I will say that when it was originally called up the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, made some objection because the bill had been reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining. Upon further consideration the Senator from Rhode Island withdrew his objection to the bill. When the bill was called up the second time the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asked that it temporarily go over in order that he might look into it a little further. I think the Director of the Mint says that if we are to establish an assay office anywhere it ought to be at this place, but he is doubtful as to the propriety of establishing any more assay offices. I think, however, this is one that ought to be established. The committee has favorably reported the bill, and I should like to have action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. The bill may be taken up later, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who heretofore objected, is not now present, and I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

DISTRICT CODE OF LAW.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask present consideration of Order of Business No. 1, being the bill (S. 493) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," which was formerly passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is a long bill, and I must object to its consideration to-day. I want to get through with the cases on the Calendar, which will not take much time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw his objection, as the amendments which are proposed by the bill to the District code are very important and should be promptly acted upon.

Mr. HALE. If that bill is read, nothing more will be done this morning. I do not want to consume all the time with the reading of that bill. I am not opposed to the bill, but I do not want the hour, which might be devoted to passing twenty-five or thirty bills in which Senators are interested, taken up in reading the bill to which the Senator from North Carolina refers.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, this is a very important measure, and I give notice that I shall endeavor to get early action of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, and the next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

AGREEMENT WITH INDIANS OF ROSEBUD RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 2992) to ratify an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 3, on page 5, line 18, after the word "missions," to insert "and lands reserved for common schools as provided in section 4 of this act;" so as to read:

That the lands ceded to the United States under said agreement, excepting such tracts as may be reserved by the President, not exceeding 398,000 acres in all, for subside station, Indian day school, 1 Catholic mission, and 2 Congregational missions, and lands reserved for common schools as provided in section 4 of this act, shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof; and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the bill, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. That sections 16 and 36 of the lands hereby acquired in each township shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose; and in case either of said sections, or parts thereof, of the lands in said county of Gregory is lost to said State of South Dakota by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians now holding the same, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized, in the tract herein ceded, to locate other lands not occupied, in quantity equal to the loss, and such selection shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move to amend the bill in section 3, on page 6, line 18, by striking out after the word "acre," down to and including the word "that" before the word "homestead," in line 25, and inserting the word "and" before the word "homestead."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 6, line 18, after the word "acre," it is proposed to strike out:

But settlers under the homestead law, who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the lands so entered upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fee and commissions, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry, except that.

And insert "and," so as to read:

And provided further, That the price of said lands shall be $2.50 per acre, and homestead settlers who commute their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, shall pay for the land entered the price fixed herein.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, the bill submitted to the Senate for consideration was prepared by the Interior Department, and has its approval and indorsement. Two amendments were suggested to the bill by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they have already been adopted by the Senate. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] eliminates that provision in the bill in regard to the opening of the lands to free homes. These lands are situated in the southern part of South Dakota, west of the Missouri River, and adjoining the great Sioux Reservation. The Government agrees to pay the Indians $2.50 per acre for the land proposed to be ceded. The lands affected by this agreement involve about 521,000 acres. Of that amount 105,000 acres have been allotted to 452 Indians, leaving, practically, 416,000 acres unallotted and to be thrown open to settlement under this agreement.

Under the provisions of the enabling act authorizing the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union, sections 16 and 36 in every township were reserved for school purposes. This provision did not apply to permanent Indian reservations, but became operative when the Indian title was extinguished and the lands restored to and became a part of the public domain. This would withdraw about 29,000 acres of these lands and would leave 387,000 acres to be opened to settlement, and which would be affected by the proposed amendment.

Mr. President, we believe that the bill as reported by the committee should pass without the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut. It has long been the policy of the Government to open the Western reservations to free homes. The homestead law enacted so many years ago certainly proved of inestimable value, not only to the West, but to the country at large. A different policy was inaugurated some ten or twelve years ago, under which, when reservations were opened, the settler was obliged to pay the same price for the land that the Government paid the Indians for the relinquishment of their title.

Two years since a free-homes bill was passed by Congress after having been discussed at great length, especially in this body. It occurs to us that by that act the homestead policy has been reestablished by the Government. We do not believe it is wise now to reopen that question.

When the bill to open the Crow Reservation in Montana was recently under consideration in this body it passed without any opposition on the part of Senators; and it opened those lands to free homesteads, involving, I think, something like 1,000,000 acres. We believe that the same rule should be applied to the lands in South Dakota, and that this reservation should be opened in like manner.

Settlers who go upon these new lands to open and develop them necessarily meet severe and trying conditions. They are inaccessible and far removed from railway or other facilities of communication. The settlers are obliged to bear all the burdens incident to organizing and developing the local community. They are compelled to build highways and bridges, to erect school-houses, and maintain schools, the courts, and jails, and all the expenses of local government. Within the limits of the lands proposed to be opened to settlement there are upward of 450 Indian allottees, and the settlers who take these lands will be obliged to assume the responsibilities of the local community practically unaided by the Indians, and to bear largely all the responsibilities that heretofore have been borne by the General Government.

The Indians have selected the choicest and best lands along the streams, and the settlers who move in will be obliged to take the more undesirable lands.

I believe the men who settle upon this reservation and bear these responsibilities and who build up these new communities ought to have their lands at the same price that was paid by other settlers upon adjacent lands of like character. I believe it is nothing more than an act of simple justice, considering the hardships they must endure and the responsibilities they must necessarily assume.

It is a question of policy, and I do not believe we should depart from the one heretofore adopted by the enactment of the free-homes law two years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this question ought to be understood by the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me a moment, as I moved the amendment which is pending?

Mr. STEWART. I want to speak to that amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish to make a single suggestion.

Mr. STEWART. All right. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I had hoped that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] would accept the amendment, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] accepted the amendment in relation to the bill opening up the Devils Lake Reservation, and I want to say now that if this amendment is to be opposed the bill can not be disposed of this morning.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to make merely a remark or two in order to call the attention of the Senate to the situation we are in. Although the Indians have no title, except the title of occupancy, the Government is bound to take care of them, and to see that justice is done them. For the most part we have submitted to the Indians the fixing of the price of the lands which we have purchased. As the land is settled, the Indians put up the price according to the price of adjoining lands that are cultivated by white people. In this very case the committee had much doubt whether the land was worth $2.50 an acre; but they finally consented to report the bill, because the Senator from South Dakota insisted that it would be detrimental and ruinous to the State of South Dakota to have settlement there tied up in this way, and that these lands ought to be opened.

If Congress should exercise the power to fix a reasonable price on the land we open, and pay the Indians for it, there would be no serious objection to free homesteads; but if the Indians are to fix an exorbitant price, the Government pay it, and then open the land to free homes, there would be great friction before we disposed of these millions of acres of land. This raises a very serious question. I was in hopes the Senators from South Dakota would avoid the question by adopting the same course which was adopted by the Senators from North Dakota as to the Devils Lake Reservation. They accepted a similar amendment to that bill, and the bill was passed. The Crow Reservation was also opened, and there was probably paid not more than half as much as it was worth in the market, and the Government will be fully reimbursed in that case.

A large portion of this particular reservation will not be worth very much, because it is not arable land. If the Government pays $1.25 an acre for the land, and that is all the Indians ought to demand, then I should be in favor of opening it to free homesteads, but I am not in favor of paying the Indians a price which is fixed by the value of adjoining land held by white men, and then opening it to free homes, because before we get through with it we shall find that it will involve a vast amount of money.

I make these observations so that the situation may be understood by the Senate. If Congress adopts the policy of fixing the price of land to be opened and not leave it to the Indians, then we can open it to free homesteads for such price as will be reasonable; but if we leave it to the Indians to fix the price, under the advice of white men around there, then it will become so extravagant that the scheme can not be carried out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, as I remarked a moment ago, I did hope that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] would accept the amendment I have offered, which is the same as that placed in the bill opening the Devils Lake Indian Reservation a few days ago, which was accepted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], who was interested in opening that reservation, and it was adopted by the Senate.

Manifestly we must have some policy with reference to the opening of these reservations. If the Senator from South Dakota insists on opposing this amendment, we can not discuss this question under the five-minute rule, and I shall be compelled to object to the further consideration of the bill this morning.

I want to say right here and now, however, that the State of South Dakota, as it seems to me, ought to be pretty well satisfied when we pay to the Indians $2.50 an acre for this land and then give to the State of South Dakota two sections, amounting in value to something over $75,000, which is a clean gift of so much money from the Government to the State of South Dakota, without any obligation whatever on the part of the Government to do so.

The Senator from South Dakota said that when the State of South Dakota was admitted to the Union there was a provision in the enabling act that two sections in each township should be reserved for school purposes. That is true, Mr. President; but there was also an express proviso in that act that that reservation should not apply to any land which was then within an Indian reservation. So the amendment which has been already adopted is a clean gift to the State of South Dakota of $2.50 an acre for all the lands embraced in those two sections in each township, which would amount, I think, to something about $75,000, without pretending to be accurate about it.

Mr. President, this is a question which is very much larger and more far-reaching in its importance than the mere question of whether this bill is to pass in the form in which it was reported by the committee, or whether the amendment I have proposed shall be adopted. It is true that several years ago—more than ten years ago, I think—in opening Indian reservations, we paid large and extravagant prices for land to the Indians, upon the theory that the Government was going to be reimbursed for its expenditures by the settlers paying for the land which they settled upon a sufficient sum to reimburse the Government. That went on for years, and everybody supposed that that was acceptable to the settlers. Then the settlers began to agitate that the Government should remit to them the obligation which they had incurred to pay for the land, and thereby reimburse the Government; and the history of that agitation of course is well known. The Government remitted about $35,000,000 which it had paid to the Indians and which the settlers had agreed to repay to the Government by the passage of that free-homes bill.

I well remember the argument here on that question. It started as to Oklahoma. The ground upon which it was put was not so much that the free-homes policy should be continued where we bought the lands from the Indians, but that this land was in the semi-arid region and it was impossible for the settlers to make the money on the farms in that semi-arid region to pay what they had agreed to pay. The argument was extended beyond Oklahoma to all the lands which had been thus opened to settlement. I do not wish to say, Mr. President, that the Government was imposed upon by that argument, but I do wish to say that since that free-homes bill passed you can not get any person in Oklahoma who will deny that the lands which were thus affected are worth $20, $25, and $30 an acre. The school fund commissioners of Oklahoma, immediately after the passage of that act, reported to the Government that the lands belonging to the school fund in Oklahoma were worth, on an average, $30 an acre.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. Mr. COCKRELL. It is manifest that we can not dispose of this bill under the five-minute rule or under the half-hour rule. So I think it will have to go to the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri objects to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. Will the bill go over without prejudice?

Mr. COCKRELL. It can not be discussed under the five-minute rule, and it is not worth while to keep it on the Calendar under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GAMBLE. Perhaps it might be passed without prejudice this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to its being passed over without prejudice once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 3504) to provide an American register for the steamer Brooklyn was announced as the next case in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property" was announced as the next case in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. NELSON subsequently said: I was momentarily called out of the Chamber. What was done with Order of Business 742, Senate bill 1792?

Mr. HALE. It went over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. NELSON. Retaining its place on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Retaining its place on the Calendar.

The bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent, was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All these bills will go over without prejudice.

ORDER BOOK OF GEN. ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The joint resolution (S. R. 26) authorizing the Secretary of War to negotiate with John T. Dolan, of Portland, Oreg., for purchase of original manuscript copy of "order book of Gen. Arthur St. Clair," was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. I told the Senator from Oregon I would look into the joint resolution. It is a matter of such small moment, however, that I do not think it is worth while to interpose any further objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may now be considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of War to negotiate with John T. Dolan, of Portland, Oreg., with the view of purchasing for the use of the Government the original manuscript copy of the "order book" of Gen. Arthur St. Clair, and if on inspection of the original manuscript it is deemed advisable by the Secretary of War, in the interest of complete and accurate military history of the Government, to purchase the same for the use of the Government, he is authorized to do so, paying therefor a sum not exceeding $300.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOORES CREEK BATTLEFIELD, NORTH CAROLINA.

The bill (S. 3060) appropriating $5,000 to inclose and beautify the monument on the Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2291) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10530) to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 11839) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at Knights of Pythias encampment to be held at San Francisco, Cal.;

A bill (H. R. 12093) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Neuse River at or near Kinston, N. C.;

A bill (H. R. 10363) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at Ocracoke Island, on the coast of North Carolina; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 155) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Charlotte, N. C., for the ornamentation of the public grounds in that city.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3148) for a marine hospital at Buffalo, N. Y.; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

JURORS' AND WITNESSES' FEES IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 1919) fixing fees for jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in the State of Wyoming was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator who reported this bill is not present, and I ask that it go over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

EMPLOYEES IN TREASURY, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

The bill (S. 1694) to provide for compensation for certain employees of the Treasury, War, and Navy departments was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over.

LAND-OFFICE FEES IN MINING CASES.

The bill (S. 156) to provide for the repayment of unexpended moneys deposited to cover costs of platting and office work in connection with mining claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all moneys deposited in any United States depository for platting of mining claims and other office work in the office of any surveyor-general connected with proceedings to obtain patents shall be deemed an appropriation for the objects contemplated by such rules and regulations, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause the sums so deposited to be placed to the credit of the proper appropriation for platting and other office work in obtaining patents for mining claims; but any excesses in such sums over and above the actual cost of such platting and office work, comprising all expenses incidental thereto, and for which they were severally deposited, shall be repaid to the depositors, respectively; such payments to be made upon a statement of account therefor by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. G. BOONE.

The bill (S. 1594) for the relief of the legal representatives of A. G. Boone was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish the bill might go over for the day at least. I desire to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will go over, retaining its place.

THIERMAN &amp; FROST.

The bill (S. 4074) for the relief of Thierman & Frost was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, retaining its place.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 12093) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Neuse River at or near Kinston, N. C.; and

A bill (H. R. 10363) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at Ocracoke Island, on the coast of North Carolina.

The bill (H. R. 11839) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at Knights of Pythias encampment to be held at San Francisco, Cal., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 155) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Charlotte, N. C., for the ornamentation of the public grounds in that city, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

REPEAL OF WAR-REVENUE TAXATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10530) to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who is necessarily detained from the Senate to-day, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request for a conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT PITTSBURG, PA.

The bill (H. R. 3136) for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa., was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT EAGLE HARBOR, MICH.

The bill (S. 3492) to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Eagle Harbor, on Keweenaw Point, Michigan, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "near," to insert "Eagle Harbor on;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish a life-saving station at or near Eagle Harbor on Keweenaw Point, Michigan, in such locality as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

The bill (S. 3421) for the relief of Eleonora G. Goldsborough was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "death," to insert "with allowances for two years;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, instructed to pay to Eleonora G. Goldsborough, widow of the late Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough, of the Marine-Hospital Service, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, two years' pay at the rate of salary he was receiving as surgeon at the time of his death, with allowances for two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the report be read.
The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. BURNHAM on the 20th instant.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut rose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the whole report be read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Do you want the whole of it read?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do, if the bill is going to pass to-day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the reading proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to make some inquiries in regard to it.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator who reported this bill is not present, and I suggest that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, that the whole report be printed in the RECORD, and then that the bill go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that course, but in the report—the Senator who made the report I believe is not present—there is a statement which I must confess astonishes me. The report says:

Now, inasmuch as the statute law gives to the widows of surgeons in the Army and Navy two years' pay, and inasmuch as your committee agree with Dr. Hamilton that no distinction should be made in the emoluments of the two branches of the medical service, your committee, after a full consideration of the bill, conclude that the officers of the hazardous service in question should be given the same consideration in the matter of emoluments as Army and Navy surgeons.

I should like to see that statute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was going to call attention to these recommendations, but I thought perhaps, as the Senator who reported the bill is not present, it had better go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the remainder of the report be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the whole of the report be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

[To accompany S. 3421.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3421) granting two years' pay of her husband to Mrs. Eleonora G. Goldsborough, widow of the late Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough, of the Marine-Hospital Service, have given the same careful consideration, and respectfully report that the facts are as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The memorial of Eleonora G. Goldsborough respectfully represents to your honorable body that she is the widow of Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough, late in the Marine-Hospital Service, and on behalf of herself and the minor children of the said Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough she respectfully prays that you will grant her the relief she asks for in her bill, to be paid to her; and for the purpose of informing your honorable body as to the facts upon which her bill is based she sets forth as follows:

(1) Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough was examined in accordance with law for admission into the service in August, 1877, and on October 3, 1877, was appointed an assistant surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service.

He was first stationed in New York as assistant; was appointed in charge of the service in Norfolk, Va., and remained there two months; he was placed on special duty in Washington and Baltimore, and was assistant at New York for five months; he was nine months chief clerk in the city of Washington, and was then placed in charge of the service in the city of Baltimore, where he remained for three years, until April, 1882.

In October, 1880, he was promoted to the office of passed assistant surgeon while in charge of the Baltimore service. From Baltimore he was ordered to Mobile, where he remained in charge of the Marine-Hospital Service for three years and six months, until October 20, 1885, when he was ordered to Chicago, where he remained in charge of the service for two years and four months, until February 9, 1888.

While in Chicago he was promoted to the office of full surgeon October 1, 1886. From Chicago he was ordered to New Orleans, where he remained one year and eleven months, and died in the service January 5, 1890, leaving to survive him his widow, your petitioner, and two children, Charles Bloomfield, 9 years, and Irwin, 5 years of age.

The net income from the farm, after paying the interest on the mortgage and all other charges and expenses incident to the same, when the crops are good is about $50, and the dividends derived from the bank stock amount to about $120, making the entire income received by your petitioner for the support of herself and her two children $170, which is liable to be decreased at any moment by the failure of the crops upon which the income from the farm depends.

(3) Your petitioner's husband, while engaged in the service of the Government, devoted himself with untiring energy to his duty, and he was constantly exposed, not only to the danger of disease incident to his calling but to the dangers arising by the constant change of climate, which in the course of his duty while under orders he was obliged to undergo, and his constitution was undoubtedly greatly undermined thereby.

While on duty in the city of Mobile he was desperately ill with malarial fever, and from there he was ordered to Chicago, the extreme cold of which, following upon the warmer temperature of Mobile, brought on a serious attack of rheumatism, from which he had not wholly recovered when he was again ordered to New Orleans. While engaged in the course of his duty he contracted blood poison in the performance of an operation, which also tended to undermine his health, and in April, 1889, he was again attacked by malarial fever, which his already weakened constitution was unable to withstand, and from which, together with the other complications, he eventually died.

(4) Your petitioner further represents that the compensation received by her husband and the frequent removals which in the course of his duty it became necessary for him to make rendered it impossible for him to save up more money than a portion of that which was left and which has been lost through no fault of your petitioner.

(5) Your petitioner has done and is doing all in her power to support herself and her children, and will continue to do so and will use all means in her power by her own exertions to increase the small income which she now receives.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned respectfully represent to your honorable body that they are personally cognizant of many of the facts stated in the foregoing memorial of Eleonora G. Goldsborough, and those of which they are not cognizant personally they believe to be therein stated truly. They further state that they believe the said Eleonora G. Goldsborough, the widow of Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough, and his two children are in great need of some support, and that the services of the late Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough entitle them to be paid a pension, and they are personally aware that she is using every honorable means to assist in the support of herself and her children.

JAS. SOMERS SMITH.

ANNA M. SMITH.

D. HAYES AGNEW.

W. DUBOIS MILLER.

(Since the date of the above memorial the farm and bank stock mentioned in section 2 have been disposed of at a sacrifice, and the proceeds have been entirely expended in the support of the petitioner's family.)

The affidavits of Mrs. Goldsborough and Mrs. Annie E. Haverstick, in the possession of your committee, show that Surgeon Goldsborough contracted blood poisoning while operating on a negro sailor in the United States marine hospital in New Orleans, La., in August, 1888.

In a letter from Surgeon Goldsborough to Dr. John B. Hamilton, the then Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, dated at Chicago, Ill., September 25, 1888, he states that he is suffering from carbuncles and is totally unfit for duty, his statement being substantiated by the accompanying certificate of Surg. H. W. Austin, of the Marine-Hospital Service, his attending physician.

That Surgeon Goldsborough suffered from the effects of blood poisoning up to the time of his death is shown by the affidavits of Mrs. Goldsborough and Mrs. Haverstick, above referred to, and that his death was due primarily to the blood poisoning is proved by the affidavit of his attending physician at the time of his death, Dr. R. P. M. Ames, which is here set forth in full:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., March 7, 1902.

I hereby certify that I attended Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough in the marine hospital, New Orleans, in November and December, 1889, and until his death, January 5, 1890. His death was due primarily to "blood poisoning," as manifested by the formation of abscesses and carbuncles.

While not personally cognizant of the fact, as I was not stationed in New Orleans at the time, I have frequently heard that Surgeon Goldsborough had been poisoned while operating upon a negro sailor in the summer of 1888.

Very respectfully,

R. P. M. AMES.

Late Passed Assistant Surgeon, M. H. S.

Subscribed and sworn to this 7th day of March, 1902, before me.

FRANK E. CARPENTER,

Notary Public.

There can be no reasonable doubt that Surgeon Goldsborough's death was directly due to the effects of the operation in August, 1888.

Dr. John B. Hamilton, Supervising Surgeon-General, Marine-Hospital Service, appeared before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House and there advocated that a pension should be allowed Mrs. Goldsborough, stating that Dr. Goldsborough was an able and efficient officer, and the duty he was on subjected him to orders involving change of climate and contact with epidemic diseases, and the Doctor urged, as a matter of justice, that there should be no distinction in the allowance of pensions between the surgeons of the Marine-Hospital Corps and the medical officers of the Army and Navy.

Now, inasmuch as the statute law gives to the widows of surgeons in the Army and Navy two years' pay, and inasmuch as your committee agree with Dr. Hamilton that no distinction should be made in the emoluments of the two branches of the medical service, your committee, after a full consideration of the bill, conclude that the officers of the hazardous service in question should be given the same consideration in the matter of emoluments as Army and Navy surgeons.

It may be further stated that Congress, by an act approved March 4, 1882, provided for the payment of two years' salary to the families of members of the Life-Saving Service in the event of their death as a result of their peculiar calling, and that a precedent for the bill now under consideration has been set by the act approved June 15, 1888, which granted the legal representatives of Asst. Surg. John W. Branham, of the Marine-Hospital Service, the amount of his salary and allowances for two years, Dr. Branham having died of yellow fever.

Your committee are of the opinion that Dr. Goldsborough died of an infectious disease acquired in the performance of his duty, and the bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In line 8 strike out the period after the word "death" and insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add after such comma the words "with allowances for two years."

SOUTH DAKOTA LOWER BRULE SIOUX INDIANS.

The bill (S. 912) to reimburse certain Lower Brule Sioux Indians of South Dakota for property destroyed was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the claims of the members of the Lower Brule band of Sioux Indians for loss of property resulting from their forcible removal from their homes south of White River, in South Dakota, in the year 1893, and to determine what amounts they may be justly and equitably entitled to for the loss of such property, and to certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay such sums so certified to him by the Secretary of the Interior to members of the Lower Brule band of Indians as aforesaid. And the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD HAINES AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 4306) for the relief of Edward Haines, John Haugland, Wallace L. Reed, W. D. Davis, Martin Monson, Johann Bottjer, and the legal representatives of J. P. Ferwerda, deceased, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over—retaining its place?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

PROTECTION OF MINERS.

The bill (H. R. 8327) to amend an act entitled "An act for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories" was next in order on the Calendar, and was read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator who reported this bill is not present, and as the act amended is not so pointed out that I can find it readily, I wish that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over—retaining its place?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. PENROSE. During my absence from the Senate Chamber the bill (H. R. 3136) for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa., favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce, was passed over. I should like to have the bill considered now, if there is no objection to it.

The bill was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Pittsburg, Pa., a suitable and commodious building for a marine hospital, at a cost which shall not exceed $125,000 when finally completed.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would tell us what is the scheme of the committee as to marine-hospital buildings. An enrolled bill has just been signed providing for another at Buffalo. Is it the plan of the committee to establish marine hospitals within a short distance of each other all over the country?

Mr. PENROSE. I have sent for the report and I should like to have it read.

Mr. HALE. Yes; that will be better.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill has been favorably reported, and it has passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is at the desk.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me as if the two places were rather near each other to have marine hospitals.

Mr. PENROSE. This bill has been approved by the Treasury Department. I ask that the report may be read.

Mr. HALE. Let the report be read. That will be better.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 20th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3136) for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa., having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the report of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is adopted as the report of your committee.

[House Report No. 948, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3136) to establish a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa., having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The city of Pittsburg with its adjoining cities and boroughs, all of which substantially constitute one city, has a population of 775,000. It is at the head waters of the Ohio, and has an inland tonnage exceeding that of any other city in the world. Cities of lesser need have marine hospitals, while it has none. Surgeons-General of the Marine-Hospital Service and Secretaries of the Treasury have repeatedly called the attention of Congress to its need for a marine hospital. So long ago as June, 1874, twenty-eight years ago, there was an appropriation for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, but because of its insufficiency a building was never erected, and the site which was purchased, being very desirable for other purposes, was finally allowed to be sold.

Now, the marine-hospital station at Pittsburg has grown to such proportions that it requires the services of two physicians and surgeons to look after the ill of the river men. Dr. F. W. Meade, who has long been in the service of the Government, was detailed only recently to report for duty there by Surg. Gen. Walter Wyman. Dr. Meade, who has had a most varied experience in the practice of medicine, has spent much of his time in Boston, Portland, Me., and St. Louis. His first detail to duty was at the latter place.

Dr. R. C. Craig, who has been in charge of the marine-hospital department at Pittsburg, has been stationed there for the last three years, and orders recently sent from Washington will keep him there for an indefinite period. Dr. Craig served two years at New York and one year at St. Louis.

The sick marines are now sent to the Mercy Hospital, where there are 67 patients in the marine ward. The expense of taking care of these men is paid by the Government. The revenue derived is collected from ocean vessels, the amount being regulated according to the tonnage.

Last year 1,250 patients were treated at the office of the marine surgeon in the Federal building, and the work has so increased that it became necessary to detail an additional physician. Drs. Meade and Craig are heartily in favor of the idea of establishing a hospital at Pittsburg for the exclusive use of the river men. Pittsburg is the only port of any consequence on the Ohio or Mississippi rivers that does not boast of an institution of the kind.

The necessity for a hospital at Pittsburg is rapidly growing, and it is desirable that the patients should be under the direct care of the Marine-Hospital Service, instead of, as now, under the care of other institutions under contract.

There is no marine hospital upon the Ohio River nearer to Pittsburg than Cincinnati, which is 250 miles away.

In view of all the facts your committee is clearly of the opinion that the bill ought to pass with an amendment striking out all after the word "completed," in line 11, as suggested by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and so recommend.

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and one of the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service are hereto appended as part of this report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 13, 1902.

SIR: Referring to your communication, dated the 29th ultimo, requesting a report in connection with H. R. 3136, providing for the acquisition of a suitable site and the erection of a building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa., I have the honor to advise you that from information in the possession of the Department it appears that provision should be made for accommodations for 50 patients, allowing for each patient a minimum cubic air space of 1,500 cubic feet; that there should be 2 wards of 20 beds and 2 wards of 5 beds each; also, suitable quarters for one or two medical officers, a hospital steward, and 15 attendants, and provisions for heating kitchen, dining rooms, laundry, baths, etc.

Mr. HALE. The figures given are only in support of the recommendation of the Secretary. They throw no new light upon the question except in that way. I do not think the report need be read further unless some Senator asks for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GEORGETOWN, S. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Georgetown, S. C.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States custom-house, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Georgetown and State of South Carolina; the cost of the site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Georgetown, State of South Carolina."

STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS IN CERTAIN LAND CASES.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4264) providing that the statutes of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in any courts for the recovery of lands patented under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report of the committee be read. It is very short. Let the first part of it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just that part of the report showing the necessity for the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I can explain to the Senator in a few moments what the bill is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. It is simply owing to the fact that some thirty or thirty-five years ago the Shawnee tribe of Indians were authorized to receive patents for their lands. Since then they have been conveyed from time to time, and pretended heirs have appeared and have brought suit for interest in the land. The bill is recommended in the strongest possible terms both by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that patents were actually issued.

Mr. HARRIS. They were actually issued, and then—
 Mr. COCKRELL. The title passed from the Government?
 Mr. HARRIS. Subsequently deeds were made under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.
 Mr. COCKRELL. All right.
 The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The amendments of the committee will be reported in the order in which they stand.

Mr. PROCTOR. I suggest that the amendments be considered later. I think there is no occasion to read them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments, then, will be deferred.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President—

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dolliver,	Kittredge,	Pettus,
Bard,	Elkins,	Lodge,	Platt, N. Y.
Bate,	Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Pritchard,
Berry,	Foster, Wash.	McLaurin, Miss.	Proctor,
Beveridge,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Quarles,
Blackburn,	Gamble,	Mallory,	Scott,
Burnham,	Hale,	Millard,	Simmons,
Burrows,	Hanna,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Money,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Culberson,	Heitfeldt,	Patterson,	Vest.
Deboe,	Jones, Nev.	Perkins,
Dillingham,	Kearns,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, this bill proposes to put a tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine when it is colored so as to make it pass for an entirely different and more valuable product, and to reduce the present tax of 2 cents per pound to one-fourth of 1 cent per pound when it is not colored so as to deceive purchaser and consumer. It also subjects it to the laws of any State into which it may come, although it may have been introduced therein in original packages. It may be claimed that this is a measure to tax a legitimate industry out of existence. We claim that it only affects the fraud; that it may and should prevent this product from masking under false colors, and that the legitimate industry will be benefited rather than injured as the present tax is reduced.

It is a measure in the interest of the farmers, the honest producers of an article that sells for what it is, and they should be protected from this fraudulent imitation designed to sell for what it is not.

I propose in opening to give some statistics which may be useful to both sides in discussing this measure.

Census Bulletin No. 138, dated February 13, 1902, gives the latest statistics in regard to oleomargarine. It opens with the following statement, which I will ask the Secretary to read:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Oleomargarine manufacture is now for the first time made the subject of special inquiry by the Census Office. The industry was introduced into the United States prior to 1880, and at the census of that date and in 1890 its general statistics were collected and may be found in Table 1 of the accompanying report. All the large centers of the industry were visited by Mr. Garber in obtaining reports, and 17 of the largest factories were personally inspected by him. The remaining reports were secured by correspondence.

The statistics are presented in 8 tables: Table 1 showing comparative figures for the industry at the Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth censuses; Table 2 showing a comparative statement of capital for 1890 and 1900; Table 3 showing the different classes of materials and the products for 1900; Table 4 showing the annual production of oleomargarine from 1886 to 1900, inclusive, as shown in the reports of the Internal Revenue Commissioner; Table 5 showing the amount of oleomargarine shipped into each State for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899; Table 6 showing the quantity and value of the oleomargarine and oleo oil exported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, as published in the Report on Commerce and Navigation, 1900; Table 7 showing the estimated annual production of European countries; Table 8 showing the detailed statistics for the industry in 1900, by States and Territories.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it will be seen that these statistics have all been obtained from the oleomargarine manufacturers themselves either by personal visits of the census agents or by correspondence with the manufacturers.

Table 1 shows that in 1880 the value of the oleomargarine produced was $6,892,939, and in 1890 it had fallen to $2,988,525. The statistician gives the following reason for this decrease.

This large decrease is due, in part, to the fact that certain States—notably New York—enacted effective legislation antagonistic to the manufacture of oleomargarine, and the act of Congress of 1886 imposing a special tax of $600 on manufacturers forced a few small producers out of business.

It is probable, Mr. President, that this decrease is apparent rather than real, and that it is due to imperfect reports. As stated in that bulletin, there was no systematic gathering of statistics until the last census. In 1900 the value produced was $12,499,812, an increase of 318 per cent over that of 1890.

Table 3 shows the quantity and cost of the ingredients used in 1900 and the value of the products, and I ask to have this table printed in full. The total cost of materials, it will be seen, is $7,639,501, and of the products $12,499,812.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The table will be inserted in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE 3.—Materials and products, 1900.

Mr. PROCTOR. Table 4 gives the quantity of oleomargarine produced and the internal revenue received in each year from 1887 to 1900, inclusive.

Table 5 gives the quantity of oleomargarine shipped into each State for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899. I do not think a reprint of these tables important in this discussion.

Table 6 gives the quantity and value of oleo oil and oleomargarine exported to each of many foreign countries during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. The total exports of oleo oil were 146,739,681 pounds, of the value of $10,503,856, and of oleomargarine 4,182,536 pounds, of the value of $409,083.

Table 7, based on commercial estimates, shows approximately the annual production of oleomargarine in European countries. I ask to have that table printed in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The table referred to will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE 7.—Annual production of oleomargarine in European countries.

Country.	Quantity produced.	Quantity imported.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
United Kingdom.....	82,000,000	110,000,000
Denmark.....	35,000,000	4,500,000

Germany.....	220,000,000	.....
Netherlands.....	123,000,000	.....
Belgium.....	20,000,000	.....

Table 7 indicates that Germany is the greatest producer of oleomargarine, with a product of 220,000,000 pounds, followed by the Netherlands, with 123,000,000 pounds. According to the figures of this table, the United States, with an output of more than 100,000,000 pounds, ranks third in production.

Mr. PROCTOR. Formulas are given of the ingredients used in the manufacture of three different grades of oleomargarine, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the formulas will be printed.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Formula 1.—Cheap grade.

	Pounds.
Oleo oil.....	495
Neutral lard.....	265
Cotton-seed oil.....	315
Milk.....	255
Salt.....	120
Color.....	1½
Total.....	1,451½

Will produce from 1,265 to 1,300 pounds of oleomargarine.

Formula 2.—Medium high grade.

	Pounds.
Oleo oil.....	315
Neutral lard.....	500
Cream.....	280
Milk.....	280
Salt.....	120
Color.....	1½
Total.....	1,490½

Will produce from 1,050 to 1,080 pounds of oleomargarine.

Formula 3.—High grade.

	Pounds.
Oleo oil.....	100
Neutral lard.....	130
Butter.....	95
Salt.....	32
Total.....	357½

Will produce about 352 pounds of oleomargarine.

Mr. PROCTOR. It will be seen that cotton-seed oil is only used in the cheapest grade. In regard to this I will ask the Secretary to read what the bulletin states.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the cheap grades cotton-seed oil is often substituted for a portion of oleo oil and neutral lard, but never to the total exclusion of either. It never fully replaces them, but is added to some combination of those two ingredients to cheapen the product. It is a liquid within the range of temperature to which butter is exposed, and its use is therefore limited to such a proportion in any formula as will not soften the product beyond the usual consistency of butter. Its use would doubtless increase largely were it not for the fact that no process has been discovered that will take away its characteristic flavor. To make a high-grade oleomargarine it is absolutely essential that all its constituent oils respond fully to the neutralizing treatment by which their characteristic odors and flavors are removed, so that they will take on the flavor of butter from the aromatic principles of the milk or cream with which they are churned. Cotton-seed oil, when forming any considerable proportion of oleomargarine betrays its presence, and those manufacturers making a specialty of high-class table products have discontinued its use altogether.

Mr. PROCTOR. I call special attention to this statement, which comes from the manufacturers of oleomargarine, that cotton-seed oil can only be used in the cheaper products, and the manufacturers are already discontinuing its use to some extent. It will be seen from the formulas given of the ingredients that cotton-seed oil is not put down as an ingredient except in No. 3, the cheapest grade.

In this connection I will give some of the facts concerning cotton-seed oil, derived from Census Bulletin No. 129, dated January 27, 1902, to show of how little comparative value is the cotton-seed oil used in oleomargarine:

COTTON-SEED OIL.

[Facts derived from Bulletin No. 129.]

	Gallons.	Value.	Average value per gallon.
Amount of oil produced in 1900 in United States.....	93,325,729	$21,390,674	22.9
Amount of oil exported in 1900.....	46,902,390	14,127,538	30.1

Amount exported: 50.25 per cent of gallons, and 66.5 per cent of value.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suppose the statement of the Senator is to the effect that about half of the product of cotton-seed oil is exported and that that industry will not be so much damaged by this legislation if it becomes a law. I will ask him if he can give us any information as to what proportion of the cotton-seed oil that is exported is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine in foreign countries?

Mr. PROCTOR. Those figures I have not been able to find. There are tables in the bulletins to which I have referred that show the amount exported to each of the foreign countries to which it goes, but I have seen no figures to show what it is used for at its destination. I will show something of the proportion of the product that is used in this country in oleomargarine.

Amount used in oleomargarine manufacturing in the United States, 1,575,800 gallons of the 93,325,729 gallons produced, or 1.68 per cent. The product of cotton seed crushing plants is not confined to oil, but other marketable products of the mill are linters, or "short lints;" hulls for paper stock and fertilizer and cattle feed; meal and cake for cattle feed and fertilizers. The total value in 1900 of products of the cotton-seed industry was $42,411,835. The value of cotton-seed oil used in oleomargarine in 1900 was $567,790, or 1.34 per cent. The amount and value of cotton-seed oil exports have increased largely during the past few years.

I ask that Table 3 of Bulletin 129 may be printed in full in my remarks. This table gives the exports of cotton-seed oil from 1870 to 1901, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

* Commerce and Navigation of the United States.

<sup>b</sup> The value of cotton-seed oil, at the time of exportation, in the ports of the United States whence exported.

* Quantity not stated.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, Table 6 of Bulletin No. 129 gives the quantity and value of crude products from a ton of cotton-seed oil, and I ask that it may be printed in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the table referred to by the Senator from Vermont will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE 6.—Crude products per ton of cotton seed.

Products.	Quantity.		Value.
	Pounds.	Per cent.	$17.00	Per cent.
Total.....	2,000	100		100
Oil.....	282	14.1	8.61	50.4
Cake and meal.....	713	35.7	6.43	37.9
Hulls.....	943	47.1	1.29	7.5
Linters.....	23	1.1	.71	4.2
Waste.....	89	2	.....	.....

Mr. PROCTOR. The value of the oil cake, meal, and hulls from a ton of seed is nearly equal to the value of the oil. These are used largely for cattle feed, in regard to which I will ask the Secretary to read an extract from Bulletin 129.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Cattle feeding is, however, by far the most useful purpose to which these hulls have yet been applied, and this use of the product is one which must greatly increase. A mixture of ground hulls and cotton-seed meal makes one of the best feeds known to the stock-raising and dairy industries. The proportions employed are about five parts hulls to one of meal in weight. "Two and a half million tons of hulls will fatten for market an equal number of heavy beef cattle or maintain that number of dairy cattle."

Mr. PROCTOR. On this point Secretary Wilson stated before the committee:

The benefit that comes to the cotton grower through the sale of a little oil to be used in making oleomargarine is very small compared with the dairying and feeding that must be increased to use the by-product of the cotton-seed mills, and the consequent return to the soil of this most valuable of all mill feeds and fertilizers. The best interests of the cotton-seed belt lie in increasing its dairy and feeding interests, rather than in contributing a little oil toward the serious injury of dairying and feeding, that should use all the cotton-seed meal produced there.

Mr. D. A. Tompkins, an authority on cotton-seed mills and the cotton industry, says in volume 2 of his work on Cotton and Cotton Oil, published by him at Charlotte, N. C., in 1901, in regard to the relation of cotton-seed to dairy cattle what I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DAIRY CATTLE.

(Page 384.)

Some experiments in feeding dairy cattle on cotton-seed meal and hulls have erroneously led to conclusions adverse to the use of these materials for this purpose. These conclusions were hastily reached in regions where other feeding stuffs were plentiful and cheap, and more agreeable at first to the taste of the cattle. This relates mostly to the use of cotton-seed hulls. The feeding value of cotton-seed meal has now become universally recognized, and it is known that it is one of the very best of feeds, price and results considered. It is, of course, important for every dairyman who owns a farm to utilize all the home feeding stuffs; but in the South it is generally and most profitable to supplement them with the cotton-seed products. In competing in the markets of the world for beef and dairy products, it seems evident that the South's opportunity lies in the intelligent use of the cotton-seed meal and hulls.

With cotton-seed hulls and meal as feeding stuffs, supplemented by present farm products, and with good breeding and good care, the German yields (milk and butter) might be equalled.

If this could be done, then the dairy business in North Carolina, which is, as a rule, now unprofitable, might be made superior to that of New York State as now conducted, and equal to that of Germany as now conducted.

What is here said about the dairy business in North Carolina is equally applicable to most of the other cotton-growing States. This entire discussion is based upon the idea that cotton-seed meal and hulls make, in nearly all parts of the cotton-growing States, ample opportunity for profitable business in raising and fattening beef and in producing milk and butter.

The climate in the cotton-growing area is very favorable to all forms of cattle business. There must always be a certain amount of warmth supplied to cattle. If the weather is cold, the warmth must be supplied by food, and such food as is adapted to the purpose.

Mr. PROCTOR. Census Bulletin No. 138, page 15, shows that the oleomargarine makers of this country used in their product for 1900 cotton-seed oil to the extent of 11,818,921 pounds, valued at $567,790.

On the other hand, of the 884,391 tons (1,768,782,000 pounds) of cotton-seed cake and meal produced, valued at $16,030,576; 1,143,704,342 pounds, valued at $11,229,188, are exported (see Agricultural Yearbook, 1900, p. 850), leaving 625,077,658 pounds, valued at $4,801,398, to be used in this country, very largely fed to dairy cows. It is safe to say that the dairyman of the United States pays the cotton-seed-mill interests five to six times as much for their products of cake and meal as do the manufacturers of oleomargarine for cotton-seed oil. If the cotton States are interested either way it is upon the side of butter.

In regard to the production of oleo oil Bulletin No. 138 has the following statement:

The number of grades manufactured is from three to five, and, when the market is active and prices are high, about all the fat taken in slaughtering, both from cattle and sheep, is worked into one grade or another. The oil made from sheep fat can not be neutralized, and retains the characteristic odor and flavor of the animal to such degree as to be unfit for the oleomargarine demanded in American markets. It is exported to Europe, where there is demand for cheaper oils. With the beef fats the character of the animal from which they are taken is the most potent factor in the selection. Some manufacturers work into their highest grade of oleo oil practically all the fat taken from a good steer, and make one or two lower grades from the fat of cows and "canners."

This statement is derived from the manufacturers themselves by the census agents.

Other manufacturers make their highest grade from the caul and other selected fats of the best heaves, using certain intestinal and other lower forms, together with that taken from poorer animals, in making from one to three lower grades. As previously indicated the manufacture of oleo oil is more widely distributed than that of neutral lard, and while it is largely confined to the big packing houses considerable quantities are made in large cities, outside the centers of the packing industry, from fats collected in part from abattoirs and in part from retail butchers.

This extract from the bulletin suggests possibilities in the way of deleterious materials from which the oil may be produced on which I will not enlarge. From tables 6 and 8 of Bulletin No. 138 the following facts appear:

1900.	Pounds.	Value.
Oleo oil used in manufacture in United States .....	33,724,621	$2,744,235
Oleo oil exported (over 4 times) .....	146,739,681	10,503,856
Total .....	180,464,302	13,248,091

Mr. John F. Hobbs, editor of the National Provisioner, New York, who appeared before the committee in behalf of the livestock interests, gave the number of cattle slaughtered annually in this country as 11,000,000. If the use of the $2,744,235 worth of oleo oil now used in this country was entirely cut off, the loss of that amount divided among 11,000,000 of cattle would be only about 25 cents per head. Aside from the use of oleo oil in oleomargarine, Mr. Hobbs mentioned other purposes for which it was in demand.

The statistics by the Department of Agriculture show an annual increase in the exports of oleo oil in a table which I shall ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The table referred to will be printed, in the absence of objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the manufacture of neutral oil from the fat of hogs is a comparatively simple process. It is of two grades, one made from the leaf and the other from the back fat. The Bulletin states:

The oil made from back fat retains more of the flavor peculiar to lard and, like the lower grades of oleo oil, is less free from stearin or other undesirable constituents. Some packing houses mix a small per cent of back fat with the "leaf" in making their highest grade of neutral, and oleomargarine manufacturers sometimes use both grades of the finished oil in combination.

After treating of the ingredients, the Bulletin says of the manufacture:

While there is substantial uniformity in the process of manufacture, there is great diversity in the grades and combinations of material used and, consequently, in the character of the finished article. The cheapest grades of oleomargarine found on the market are made from the lowest grades of oleo oil and neutral lard, to which is added the limit of cotton-seed oil, and the whole is churned with skimmed milk or buttermilk, salted with common salt and colored with the cheaper grades of coloring matter. These low-grade oils may be manufactured from "scrap" fat and made firm by the addition of more stearin or other similar substances, so that a greater proportion of cotton-seed oil can be added to the combination. Sometimes glycerin is added to give the product a glossy appearance, and sugar or glucose to sweeten or give texture.

Secretary Wilson, when before the committee last winter in regard to the importance of dairying, stated that population in the United States is increasing faster than cattle, and he submitted a table which shows this fact, which I shall ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the table referred to will be printed.

The table is as follows:

Census year.	Number of all cattle.	Population.	Number of cattle per 100 of population.
1850 .....	17,778,907	23,191,876	76.7
1860 .....	25,620,019	31,443,321	81.5

1900 .....	43,902,414	76,295,220	57.5

Mr. PROCTOR. Secretary Wilson made a further statement before the committee, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Demand in our island possessions for meats will increase, and demand abroad will call for more of the product of the cow that is only profitable when placed in the dairy. Dairying will increase in the mountain States as homesteaders take possession of lands on which to raise families, and it will increase in the cotton-growing States as farmers realize the necessity of rotation of crops, and the increase of grazers and feeders that come through this industry.

Now, then, the tendency in the South, where they have destroyed the lands by perpetual cropping, and the tendency west of the Missouri, in the semi-dry belt, where they are destroying the grazing lands by injudicious overgrazing, is to take greater interest in the dairy cow than in the steer, and in the case of settlers who want to raise families out west of the one hundredth meridian the interest grows every day on behalf of the dairy cow, and with regard to the production of steers east of the Missouri River on the farms there is no comparison whatever. The small amount of cattle that commerce calls for in making oleomargarine is infinitesimal in value compared with the injury that the growth of this bogus industry will inflict upon legitimate agriculture that requires a dairy cow.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, there is abundant evidence that the bulk of the oleomargarine used in this country reaches the consumer as butter. The circulars of the dealers show this. I read from circulars of R. C. Dotson, a manufacturer of oleomargarine at Baltimore. He says:

A word for quality. "Economy"—

That is one grade of Mr. Dotson's manufacture—

"Economy" is fancy. "Perfection" is the happy medium of grades, good enough for fancy trade. "Clover Creamery." In producing this fancy grade of butterine scientific research has been exhausted. "Clover Creamery" is the best on earth, by actual test; made by the most approved scientific methods; possessing the very purity and flavor of the clover fields; more perfect uniformity than any other butterine or butter. The cow herself could not tell it.

The innocent cow and the innocent purchaser are both deceived. They adopt for their products names intended to deceive. For example, another Baltimore dealer advertises two grades, one as "creamery goods," the other as "dairy goods." One company takes the name of the Vermont Manufacturing Company, although not connected with Vermont by location or otherwise, an unfair use of an honest name.

The same manufacturer from whom I quoted, Dotson, of Baltimore, in another circular, which is headed, in large and very red letters, "Opportunity," says:

BALTIMORE, February 17, 1903.

Had it occurred to you that you can make money out of butterine without liability to the Government for license? Perfectly simple. You solicit the orders by quotation or by your salesmen, turn them over to me, and I will fill them and allow you a handsome profit. It requires not a dollar invested and no responsibility on your part. You would be surprised at the nice round profit you can make in this way. Some merchants are making enormous commissions.

The profits seem to be large, as all illegitimate enterprises seek to make them. I submit the prospectus of the Standard Butterine Company, of this city, W. P. Wilkins, president, and will ask to have that portion of it printed which gives the cost and profits of the business. This gives the total cost, free on board, in this city at 8.92 cents per pound, and the prospectus claims a net profit of $4.08 per hundred pounds, or nearly 50 per cent; to be exact, 45.74 per cent.

The prospectus referred to is as follows:

TABLE OF COST AND PROFITS.

It is perhaps best to add to this prospectus a statement of the exact cost of and profits in the manufacture of butterine, compiled from manufacturing statistics and recent market quotations.

Cost, showing proportions used for each 100 pounds.

Oleo oil, 32 pounds, at 9½ cents per pound	$3.04
Neutral lard, 17 pounds, at 8½ cents per pound	1.44½
Cotton oil, 17 pounds, at 5 cents per pound	.85
Milk, 17 pounds, at 1 cent per pound	.17
Salt, 7 pounds, at ½ cent per pound	.03½
Moisture, 10 pounds, at 00 per pound	.00

100 pounds	5.54
Labor, parchment paper, tubs, etc	1.38
Internal revenue, 2 cents per pound	2.00

Total cost (f. o. b. Washington)..... 8.92

The above cost when deducted from the market price of $13 per 100 pounds shows a net profit of $4.08.

It will be seen that even if the company produced only the 400,000 pounds per month for which it now has definite orders a net profit of over $16,320 a month, or $195,840 a year, would be assured.

This would mean 8 per cent on the preferred stock of the company, or 20 per cent of the entire capitalization.

This is a simple statement of actual facts which can be easily verified. This showing surely ought to be of interest to everybody with money for which a highly profitable investment is desired.

STOCK.

The Standard Butterine Company is incorporated, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided as follows:

Five thousand shares preferred, full paid, nonassessable—par value, $100 per share—$500,000.

Five thousand shares common stock, $500,000.

BONDS.

There are also $150,000 in bonds, divided into 150 bonds, at $1,000 each, paying an interest at 6 per cent per annum.

The preferred stock is guaranteed to pay 8 per cent per annum, and the common stock ought, by conservative estimate, to pay at least 15 per cent after the first year of business.

Mr. PROCTOR. I also read from a circular of Wilkins & Co., and understand that Mr. Wilkins is the same man who is president of the Standard Butterine Company, and that Wilkins & Co. are the selling agents of the company. It is addressed to the president of the Iowa Agricultural College, and is apparently a circular intended to secure trade of colleges and schools and other institutions. It reads as follows:

WILKINS & CO., INCORPORATED,
208 Ninth street NW., Washington, D. C., November 8, 1901.

PRESIDENT IOWA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
Ames, Iowa.

DEAR SIR: Good butter is getting scarce and the demand for our butterine is increasing. Why? Simply because we are handling the very best goods to be found on the market—a substitute for butter that can not be detected.

Mr. President, that is what they fear—detection—and what we propose to make sure.

In regard to the deception in the sale and the profits on oleomargarine, Secretary Wilson testified before the committee last winter, and I ask the Secretary to read his statement on this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

When the Secretary of Agriculture, the Hon. James Wilson (p. 417), appeared before this committee, he was asked and answered a question as follows:

"Mr. SCHELL. I would like to ask further, if you know from your own experience or from the reports that have come to you of a single case where the consumer has ever been prosecuted because of being defrauded by the dealer.

"Secretary WILSON. I can find plenty of such cases in this very city. * * * There is no question about the everyday deception of us people who have to buy butter."

And later, in reply to a question by Senator MONEY (p. 421), Mr. Wilson said:

"Well, you have a perfect right to buy oleomargarine, but I do not want you to be deceived and pay 10 cents a pound too much. The poor people are being robbed by this deception to the extent of 10 cents a pound; and you and I, who have to take butter from second or third hands in this city, are deceived regularly. If you will send me samples of the butter you are eating between now and spring, I will tell you the percentage of it that is oleomargarine. I will have it analyzed. In fact, we have been analyzing it for members of Congress who have sent samples to us.

"Said President Cleveland, in his message approving the oleomargarine legislation of 1886, as shown by evidence before House Committee, page 8:

"Not the least important incident related to this legislation is the defense afforded to the consumer against the fraudulent substitution and sale of an imitation for genuine article of food of a very general household use. * * * I venture to say that hardly a pound ever entered a poor man's house under its real name and in its true character."

Mr. PROCTOR. The reduction in cost to the consumer by the reduction of the tax is shown by the following figures. In fact, it should be greater, as a manufacturer always charges a profit on such advances.

This reduction of 1½ cents on the manufacturers' selling price of 14 cents would be 12.5 per cent; 16 cents would be 10.94 per cent; 18 cents would be 9.72 per cent.

The even figures would doubtless be used and a reduction of 2 cents per pound be made in the selling price. Quite an item in a laborer's monthly account.

The statistics and statements from the Census Bulletins in regard to oleomargarine and oleo and cotton-seed oil were of course obtained by the census experts from the manufacturers of those products themselves. I have quoted no testimony from witnesses who favored the bill except briefly that of Secretary Wilson. I trust the opponents of this measure will recognize the fairness of this course.

In conclusion, we claim—

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Like all Senators here, I have been very much interested in the statistics which have been presented by the Senator from Vermont. This bill, however, purports to be a revenue measure. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any statistics or any statement from the Treasury Department showing, first, the necessity for this additional revenue, and, second, the amount of revenue the bill will produce?

Mr. PROCTOR. I have no statistics. I sought none of that kind. Of course, they would be at the best very imperfect.

In conclusion we claim:

First. That the coloring of oleomargarine is for the purpose of passing it upon the consumer for an entirely different substance.

Second. That the purpose is accomplished in the great majority of cases.

Third. That oleomargarine can be sold for what it is and that the reduction in cost made by reducing the tax 1½ cents will increase the sale, and, in a short time, more than compensate for the trade lost by lack of color, and will be a benefit to the laborer and honest consumer.

Fourth. That this being the case, there is no injury to the producers of cotton-seed or oleo oil, and at the worst any injury is compensated by resulting benefits. We claim that it is a measure to protect an honest product against a fraud.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the committee amendments shall be considered at this time?

Mr. PROCTOR. I think it would meet with better satisfaction on both sides if we were to consider the committee amendments later on, when we consider the bill on its passage, perhaps.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask him a question? I understand he is about to conclude his remarks.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have concluded, but I shall be glad to hear any question.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution, has the right to legislate upon the subject of fraudulent or adulterated food products unless they are the subject of interstate commerce? In other words, can the Congress of the United States come into my State and legislate as to the inspection of articles for food or the adulteration of articles for food when the transaction or the product or the sale is confined exclusively to the citizens of Missouri, and where there is no pretense that interstate commerce is affected in any way?

Mr. PROCTOR. I certainly do, but that is a phase of the question upon which I have not touched. Others will consider and discuss it later.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the report in the case been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been read. There are several committee amendments, and it is the desire of the committee to have them deferred until later.

Mr. BATE. Let the report be read.

Mr. MONEY. I will take the floor at this time, but I think the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is a good one. The report of the majority is quite short. The report of the minority, however, is much longer. I am perfectly willing, however, and I believe it would be a good idea, to have them both read. The Senator from Vermont, the distinguished chairman of the committee, did not have the majority report read, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the majority and minority reports is called for. The Secretary will read the majority report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. PROCTOR February 24, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9203) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, have considered the same and suggest the following amendments:

First. On page 2 strike out lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, inclusive.

Second. On page 3, in line 12, strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

Third. Strike out the whole of section 4.

And when so amended your committee respectfully recommend that the bill do pass.

This bill proposes to increase the tax on oleomargarine colored in semblance of butter and reduce that not colored in imitation of butter, the purpose being to encourage the sale of the genuine article and to discourage the fraudulent sale of the imitation article, and to protect the honest producer, dealer, and consumer of both butter and oleomargarine.

The laws heretofore enacted to prevent the fraudulent selling have proved fruitless to remedy the evil, and it has been shown that existing laws are continually violated, and the violations are not easy of detection. It is apparent that the wide margin of cost between oleomargarine and butter is an incentive to the retail dealer to perpetrate the fraud for the sake of large profits, and it has been shown that the manufacturer frequently aids and abets him in so doing.

The need for such a law is evidenced by the State laws which have been passed by 32 States and by the general public interest on the subject. The law of 1886 does not identify the commodity to the consumer, the evidence being that a very large proportion of the oleomargarine manufactured reaches the consumer finally as butter, either as a purchaser of the retailer, or as a guest at a hotel, restaurant, or boarding house.

The House has twice indorsed the principles of what is known as the Grout bill, providing an increase from 2 to 10 cents per pound in the tax on oleomargarine colored to imitate butter and to reduce the same on the uncolored article to one-fourth of 1 cent per pound. This proposition met the approval of your committee in the second session of the last Congress, as shown in Report 2043, and we have seen nothing to cause us to change the conclusions reached then.

The principal opponents of the bill are the manufacturers of oleomargarine, live-stock associations, and the cotton-seed mill men.

The cotton-seed interests will be but little, if any, affected by the passage of this bill, as more than half of their oil product is exported, and of the portion retained in this country only the best grade of it can be used, and none is used in the manufacture of the best qualities of oleomargarine. Besides, there are other commercial avenues open for the disposition of cotton-seed oil.

We fail to see how the live-stock interests will be seriously affected, as the calf fat from which oleo oil is derived is but a very small percentage of the animal's value, and this material has commercial value for other purposes.

There is a present demand for the uncolored oleomargarine, and we believe it will grow and furnish an increasing market for this product, on which there is only a slight tax; and on the colored article there will still be left a reasonable margin of profit—sufficient, we believe, to enable the manufacturers to dispose of that product to advantage. Mr. F. W. Tillinghast, president of the Vermont Manufacturing Company, Providence, R. I., manufacturers of oleomargarine, testified that his company was making and selling white oleomargarine, and that it would be sold freely if the colored article was out of the way.

With this brief statement, we favor the passage of the bill with the amendments.

A minority of the committee will submit their views.

Mr. VEST. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendments. Let the bill as it came from the House be read and then the amendments proposed, so that we can understand exactly what the measure means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the bill has already been read. Does the Senator desire to have it read through again or only as proposed to be amended?

Mr. VEST. Let the amendments proposed by the committee be stated.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is to strike out lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 on page 2, section 1, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid any State to permit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in any manner consistent with the laws of said State provided that it is manufactured and sold entirely within the State.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry propose, on page 3, line 12, section 3, to strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or;" so that the first part of the section will read:

SEC. 3. That upon oleomargarine which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 10 cents per pound.

Mr. PROCTOR. In regard to this amendment, I will say that I do not consider it of much importance, but the bill there is a quotation from the existing law of 1886, and it has the word "or" instead of "and." It was following that act, and I think we had better follow it exactly. That is all.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry propose to strike out all of section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection to be made from time to time, and at such times as he may deem necessary, of all factories and storehouses where butter is renovated; and all butter renovated at such places shall be carefully inspected in the same manner and to the same extent and purpose that meat products are now inspected. The quantity and quality of butter renovated shall be reported monthly. All renovated butter shall be designated as such by marks, brands, and labels, and the words "Renovated butter" shall be printed on all packages thereof, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be sold only as renovated butter. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $500, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful sanitary and other rules and regulations for carrying this section into effect; and no renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from one State to another or to foreign countries unless inspected as provided in this section.

Mr. HOAR. There are a good many other matters which one has to deal with, and I have not been able carefully to follow this proposed legislation. What is the precise change made in section 8 of the law? Section 8 of the old act is to be amended. Now, what is the amendment? What is the change made by the amendment?

Mr. PROCTOR. It assesses the tax of 10 cents per pound upon oleomargarine, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof, with the proviso that when oleomargarine is free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter of any shade of yellow the tax shall be one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. HOAR. What is the present tax?

Mr. PROCTOR. Two cents a pound.

Mr. HOAR. It raises the tax from 2 cents to 10 cents?

Mr. PROCTOR. Where it is colored it raises the tax from 2 cents to 10 cents and reduces it where it is uncolored from 2 cents to one-fourth of 1 cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has called for the reading of the minority report. The minority report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the views submitted by Mr. MONEY on the 14th instant.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have looked the Senate over and there is no one listening to the reading of the views of the minority, so I suggest that the remainder of the paper be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MONEY. Oh, no; let the reading be concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator is anxious to have it read, very well.

Mr. BATE. Yes.

The reading of the views of the minority was resumed and concluded. The entire paper is as follows:

The minority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry beg leave to submit to the Senate a substitute for the bill H. R. 9203, with favorable recommendation. The substitute is as follows:

[Substitute for H. R. 9203.]

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine,' approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That all oleomargarine shall be packed by the manufacturer thereof in firkins, tubs, or other wooden packages not before used for that purpose, each containing not less than five pounds, and marked, stamped, and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe. Provided, That when such packages are packed in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps the word "oleomargarine" shall be impressed in sunken letters, the size to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, on all prints, bricks, rolls, and lumps so packed; and all sales made by manufacturers of oleomargarine and wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall be in original stamped packages. Retail dealers in oleomargarine must sell only from original stamped packages, in quantities not exceeding 10 pounds, and only in original stamped packages when packed in solid bulk, or in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps, as received from the manufacturer. Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver any oleomargarine in any other form than in the original packages as above described, or in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps, as received from the manufacturer, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not more than two years.

"SEC. 2. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows: Manufacturers shall pay $300 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

"Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in greater quantities than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein, but any manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own product only at the place of its manufacture, in the original packages to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $24 per annum. Every person who sells oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine, butterine, or other imitations of butter, and for other purposes."

Oleomargarine is a legitimate article of commerce. This has been distinctively held by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 30), which was decided May 26, 1898, the Supreme Court held as follows:

"In the examination of this subject the first question to be considered is whether oleomargarine is an article of commerce. No affirmative evidence from witnesses called to the stand and speaking directly to that subject is found in the record. We must determine the question with reference to those facts which are so well and universally known that courts will take notice of them without particular proofs being adduced in regard to them, and also by reference to those dealings of the commercial world which are of like notoriety. Any legislation of Congress upon this subject must, of course, be recognized by this court as of first importance. If Congress has affirmatively pronounced it a proper subject of commerce, we should rightly be influenced by that declaration."

After referring to the act of Congress of August 2, 1886, being the law now in force, imposing a tax of 2 cents a pound on oleomargarine, the court further stated as follows:

"This shows that Congress at the time of its passage in 1886 recognized the article as a proper subject of taxation, and as one which was the subject of traffic and of exportation to foreign countries and of importation from such countries. Its manufacture was recognized as a lawful pursuit, and taxation was levied upon the manufacturer of the article, upon the wholesale and retail dealers therein, and also upon the article itself."

Concluding upon this branch of the case, the court stated as follows: "The article is a subject of export and is largely used in foreign countries. Upon all these facts we think it apparent that oleomargarine has become a proper subject of commerce among the States and the foreign nations."

Coloring matter is used both in the making of butter and in the manufacture of oleomargarine for the purpose of catering to the tastes of consumers who have been accustomed to a generally yellow tint in both food products.

Neither the makers of butter nor the manufacturers of oleomargarine can claim rightfully any exclusive right to the use of coloring matter in their respective products. Both admit that coloring matter is used for the reason that their customers prefer an article of a yellowish tint. If customers preferred the article white, or free from any tint whatever, the makers of butter and the manufacturers of oleomargarine could just as easily, and even more easily, respond to that taste. The question for the lawmaking power to consider is this: Should the law interfere in a case of this kind and aid the makers of one product and injure the manufacturers of the other?

The second section of the proposed bill imposes a tax of 10 cents a pound upon colored oleomargarine, or, in the language of the act, "by coloration that causes it to look like butter of any shade of yellow." The advocates of this proposed legislation admit that their object is to place the tax on oleomargarine so high that it can not be placed upon the markets of the country if colored.

It is the universal opinion of those engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine that a tax of 10 cents a pound upon the product colored a yellow tint will destroy that industry, for the reason, which experience has shown, there would not be any considerable demand for oleomargarine in an uncolored condition. This opinion is based upon efforts which have already been made to introduce and sell the uncolored product in States where anticolor laws now prevail. The object, therefore, of imposing this excessive tax of 10 cents a pound upon colored oleomargarine is not for the purpose of raising revenue, but for the purpose of prohibiting its manufacture, and of thus destroying the industry. It is of no importance that the proposed legislation reduces the tax on uncolored oleomargarine from 2 cents a pound to one-fourth of a cent a pound. Unless there is reason to believe there would be a substantial production of that kind of article, the increase of the tax of 10 cents a pound would, in all probability, prevent any substantial revenue being derived from its manufacture.

The alleged frauds committed in the sale of oleomargarine are not attributed to the manufacturers, but to the retail dealers in the article.

This brings us to the consideration of the question whether fraud in the sale of oleomargarine as butter can better be prevented by the proposed legislation, which imposes a tax of 10 cents a pound upon its manufacture, or by the enactment of more stringent regulations governing the retail dealer.

Under the present law the retail dealer is required to break the original package in which he receives oleomargarine from the manufacturer. The smallest package which the law permits the manufacturer to place upon the market contains 10 pounds. The retail dealer is only permitted to sell from the manufacturer's original packages. If he desired to sell in 10-pound packages or over, he would be required to take out a wholesale dealer's license, which is fixed at $480 a year. This makes it necessary for the retailer to break the original package, and it is conceded that whatever frauds may be committed occur by reason of this fact.

If the retail dealer desires to commit a fraud upon his customer, the opportunity for so doing is thus afforded. If legislation can be enacted which will require the retail dealer to sell oleomargarine in the original package put up by the manufacturer without breaking the wrapper or the internal-revenue stamp of the Government, and if such wrappers and stamps were clearly and distinctly marked and branded, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the opportunity to commit fraud upon the customer would be wholly eliminated or reduced to a minimum. This opinion is entertained by those most intimately connected with the manufacture and selling of oleomargarine; and it is also the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, given in his statement before the Senate Committee on Agriculture; and also the opinion of ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Wilson, given in his statement before the House Committee on Agriculture.

Under the proposed bill the temptation to fraud on the part of the retail dealer would be largely increased from the fact that he will be enabled to buy the uncolored oleomargarine, on which one-fourth of a cent per pound tax is imposed, and by coloring the same himself increase the value of his product 94 cents per pound, for the reason that he could sell the same at this largely increased profit for either butter or oleomargarine.

We assume that the lawmaking power of the Government desires to prevent the possibility of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine as butter and not to destroy the industry itself. We therefore recommend legislation upon the subject which will make fraudulent sales as near impossible as laws can provide.

We have omitted reference heretofore to the first section of the pending bill. This section has for its object the placing of oleomargarine under the police laws of the several States, notwithstanding its introduction into a State in the original package. This provision is for the purpose of avoiding the effect of the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, reported in 171 U. S., 1-30. The opinion of the Supreme Court in that case was to the effect that a lawful article of commerce can not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it was manufactured. It was conceded in that opinion that a State has power to regulate the introduction of any article, including a food product, so as to insure purity of the article imported, but that such police power does not include the total exclusion even of an article of food.

The States may provide for a reasonable inspection of all food products imported into them, but the object of this legislation must be inspection and not prohibition of the traffic. It is true that Congress, in 1880, passed an act which placed intoxicating liquors under the police power of the States; but oleomargarine, which is a wholesome and nutritious food, ought not to be treated in the same manner that the law regards intoxicating liquors. The States should not be permitted by Congress to interfere in its sale, and especially should Congress refuse to place the article subject to the laws of the States which might exclude its manufacture or sale entirely. The States may inspect oleomargarine for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was free from adulterants or unwholesome ingredients; but Congress should not recognize the right of a State to exclude it from importation and sale therein, so long as it is conceded to be nutritious as an article of food.

The proposed bill is not a revenue measure. It is not for the purpose of raising revenue or reducing surplus revenue. In fact, in no sense is it a measure resting for its authority upon the taxing power of the Government. Its object is to prevent competition between two home industries by building up the one and destroying the other. Such use of the taxing power of the Government is an abuse which should not be encouraged or even tolerated for a moment. The precedent will open wide the door for all manner of vexatious schemes and instigate selfish greed to demand legislation involving every conceivable interference of Government with private interests. It is an effort to so frame our internal-revenue laws that one class of home producers will be protected from competition with another class of home producers. While our Government has adopted the policy of protecting home producers against foreign producers of the same kinds of articles, there can be no excuse or justification for interfering among our own citizens by aiding one industry at the expense and to the injury or destruction of another. This policy would tend to destroy all benefits which consumers receive from improved processes of production, from labor-saving machinery, and from the results of invention. By such means all progress could be arrested and mankind could be deprived of the blessings which modern science and genius are securing to the world.

The taxing power of the Government can not be used for any object other than the public needs. As was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wallace, 664), "To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation." While under the proposed bill the object is not to donate the taxes which may be raised to aid a particular industry, yet the imposition of the tax is for the purpose of enabling one industry to sell its products free from competition with another, and thus to exact from the public an increased price for the product, not for the benefit of the public Treasury, but for private purposes solely. The effect upon the people is the same in both cases. As was stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Topeka case, "There can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose." This doctrine is so well recognized that it is unnecessary to produce further authorities upon the subject. There is no conflict of judicial opinions; all are in harmony with the opinion in the Topeka case.

The proposed bill is class legislation of the most dangerous character. It is not demanded by any existing economic conditions in this country, and its passage would be a perversion of the taxing power of the Government and a violation of the Constitution, both in its letter and spirit.

The Hon. Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, was invited to come before the committee and give his view from a revenue standpoint. The following is a part of his testimony:

"Secretary GAGE. Of course, I only feel at liberty to state my views as the Secretary of the Treasury, and only upon that part of the bill which involves the question of revenue. I might have personal views which go far beyond those, but you would probably not care much about them.

"There is, in my opinion, an objection to the bill on either theory. If it is a revenue producer, it is superfluous; we do not need it. If it is not a revenue producer, then the title of the bill is a misnomer, and it is inoperative in the name of revenue. It seems to me that on either theory there are serious objections to it.

"I think that covers all I care to say directly on the subject.

"The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, can you tell us what has been the experience, in a general way, of your Department in the collection of the revenue on oleomargarine? You know, of course, that there is now a 2-cent tax on it.

"Secretary GAGE. Yes, sir; I think the revenue is well collected. There has been considerable discussion of that subject between the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (especially Commissioner Wilson) and myself at different times, and we think we are cheated to some extent, as we are in all revenue matters.

"Senator BATE. Then I suppose the losses in oleomargarine internal-revenue collections are about on a par with the losses in all other revenue collections?

"Secretary GAGE. Well, they are on a par with the losses in most of the revenue collections. There is not any great disparity.

"Senator ALLEN. Of course the liquor can not go out without the consent of the Government?"

"Secretary GAGE. No, sir; but the tax on liquor is $1.10 a gallon, while that on butterine is 2 cents per pound, so that the temptation is very much greater in the one case than in the other."

"Senator ALLEN. The only thing with which you are concerned is the tax?"

"Secretary GAGE. That is the main thing, of course."

"Senator MONEY. The remark you have just made, Mr. Secretary, suggests this question: You say the greater the tax the greater the incentive to fraud. The same rule would apply here, would it not?"

"Secretary GAGE. Undoubtedly."

Conflicting interests have appeared before the committee, one to demand the exercise of the taxing power in order to crush a rival in the business and the other to ask that it be permitted to continue the manufacture of a product, wholesome and nutritious, for the benefit of the thousands who are unable, by their poverty, to buy butter. The makers of oleomargarine, of dairy butter, of creamery butter, of the process of renovated or resurrected butter have all appeared, personally or by representatives, to insist upon their interests being more or less protected or not to be interfered with. The producers of cotton-seed oil and the live-stock growers have also been represented, asking that there be no further interference with the profits of their several industries for the benefit of the dairymen.

In the consideration of this subject the quarrels of the respective manufacturers and parties at interest as to the profits to be lost or made from this legislation are not so important as the rights of the consumers of the several products. There are millions of working people who are not producers of any articles of food, but who must consume these various products. They can not, all of them, buy butter, and, as the object of this bill is evidently—from the expressions of the leading advocates of the bill—to exterminate the oleomargarine industry, these great numbers of people are interested that such nefarious legislation should be defeated. They have rights as well as the manufacturers of butter and oleomargarine, as well as the cotton-seed oil and the live-stock men, and it is the cry of the consumer, the cry of the poor, that should have the first attention of the Senate.

Below is appended statements by accredited representatives of the various labor organizations of the country, and it can not be doubted that they speak not only for those who have formally accredited them to us, but also for the vast number of unrepresented poor people whose interests and whose wants are the same.

Mr. Patrick Dolan, president of the United Mine Workers' Association, testified as follows:

"Our people, Mr. Chairman, are against the passage of the measure. I represent over 40,000 miners and their families, and I know from the sentiment in other sections of the country to which I go, from talking to people who are interested in our organization, that they do not want to be deprived of the ability to purchase this wholesome article of food. If it is not made in a wholesome way, then they do not want it; but if it is just as good to them to spread their bread with as 35-cent butter, they do want it. And if this measure passes the chances are that butter will go up to 50 cents, and poor people will not be able to purchase it at all."

Mr. John Pierce, representing the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, said:

"Colored oleomargarine is at present retailed at from 12½ to 20 cents per pound. On investigation I am satisfied that most of our people are paying about 15 cents per pound for it, and I can not admit that those who buy it can afford to pay more. I therefore arrive at the conclusion that they must either find 10 cents per pound more to pay this proposed robbery (for I can not dignify it by the name of tax) or buy and eat white oleomargarine. And this to satisfy the greed of the manufacturers of butter, who think that white oleomargarine is good enough for those who can not afford to pay 10 cents additional for yellow or the 20 cents or more additional for creamery butter, or use the off grades of butter now unsalable as food."

"Shall those thus defrauded of what should be their inalienable constitutional right be compelled either to wear in their homes, on their very tables, flaunting before the eyes of their children and of those who may share their board, a badge of their poverty, and an emblem of their inability to pay a legalized robbery; or, on the other hand, to contribute from their meager board to the hellish greed of the butter interests, of whom it has been doubtless truly said that they seek to follow the fashion and form a trust, but are deterred by the existence of oleomargarine?"

"Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a good many of our people who make pretty good wages, and of course they can buy butter; but the majority of them make small wages now, especially since we got into this trust business. I know there are lots of men who do not like to buy this white oleomargarine, because it looks more like lard than anything else. It does not look like butter at all. Why should they be made to pay 10 cents a pound more because they get butter that resembles country butter and looks a little better on the table? That is why I am here to oppose the passage of this bill. It is for our people alone, for of course I do not know much about the butter business myself."

Mr. John F. McNamee, vice-president and chairman legislative committee Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly, Columbus, Ohio, said:

"I bear from the Central Labor Union of the city of Columbus, Ohio, officially known as the Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly, credentials which, with your permission, I will read to you:

"COLUMBUS, OHIO, January 5, 1901.

"To whom it may concern:

"This is to certify that the bearer, Mr. John F. McNamee, vice-president of the Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly, is authorized and empowered by said body to exert every effort and use all honorable means in accomplishing the defeat of a measure now pending in the United States Senate, and known as the Grout bill, the object of which is to destroy a legitimate industry in the interest of its competitors, said Grout bill being regarded by said Trades and Labor Assembly and all it represents as a gross injustice, class legislation, an invasion of citizenship rights, and a serious menace to the best interests of all citizens, particularly those in moderate circumstances."

"Any courtesies extended to our representative, Mr. McNamee, will be fully appreciated and remembered by the Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly."

"[SEAL.]

FRANK B. CAMERON, President.
WILLIAM P. HAUCK, Secretary."

"This letter of introduction which I have presented represents but faintly the bitter antagonism which prevails in the ranks of organized labor to said measure."

"The members of organized labor are thoroughly familiar with all of the phases of this bill. They speak about the chemical analyses which have been made of oleomargarine by official chemists, and they discuss all of the various components and ingredients of the product with almost as much familiarity as the manufacturers themselves are capable of doing. So I say that they are wide awake to the necessity, in the protection of their own interests, of having the bill defeated. Not only that; but as patriotic American citizens they feel deeply the indignity to which our legislative bodies have been subjected by this attempt to utilize them for the promotion of the interests of certain individuals and corporations in violation of every sense of right and justice and at the expense of the constitutional prerogatives of other citizens. They feel that the legislative bodies of some of our States and the Congress of the United States have been insulted by this attempt to utilize them as tools for the protection of certain interests which can not sustain themselves against competitors."

"Gentlemen, there are hundreds of thousands of our citizens in moderate circumstances who are now looking to the United States Senate for protection against the perpetration of such a gross injustice. They are depending absolutely upon that sense of justice, that sense of honor, fair play, and conservatism which has always characterized this body to protect them from this, one of the most culpable violations of their rights which any individual or combination of individuals has ever attempted to perpetrate upon the American public. They are looking to this body with the firm hope that its traditional love of justice will prevail and predominate in this crisis. Should this measure become a law, arising from the mists of the near future there will come a monster into whose insatiable maw the contributions of our citizens shall continually flow, and whose appetite shall be increased by all attempts at its gratification. This monster we have all, in our apprehensive conviction of the certainty of its existence, learned to regard as the creamery trust of the future—the combination of creamery interests into one great organization, which shall monopolize the manufacture, not only of the food product known as butter, but of everything of that nature. That octopus is now being conceived. If the United States Senate should consent to the passage of a bill so outrageously unjust as this one is, then its birth will have been accomplished."

"Now, we can not see that there is any justice whatever in placing any tax upon oleomargarine. Heaven knows that its manufacture is already sufficiently restricted and that it is an utter impossibility, under the stringent laws which exist in almost all of our States regulating its sale, for any deception to be practiced therein. And I want to assure you, gentlemen, that if any deception in this connection should be attempted in our part of the country it would be, and often is, in undertaking to palm off inferior butter for the product known as oleomargarine. I am myself a consumer of the article, and I propose that it shall be continually used by my family, because I know, and so do all of the members of organized labor who have listened to the discussions relative to this product in their various unions, that it is absolutely free from all disease germs; that the process of its manufacture is such as to destroy all the bacilli of tuberculosis and various other disease germs that exist in the cow and through the medium of butter consumption are conveyed to the human system, and that butter is not subjected to any process which will eliminate that element of danger."

"Here is an expression from one of the largest representative labor bodies in the United States—the Chicago Federation of Labor—and here is what they say relative to the tax:

"We believe the efforts to place a tax of 10 cents per pound on colored butterine is inspired by selfish motives, so that the manufacturers of butter may charge an unreasonable price for their commodity and enable the large creameries to establish surely and securely a butter trust which may raise prices as their cupidity may dictate."

"Here is another expression:

"Justice demands equal rights for both manufacturers of butter and butterine, both products having equal merit. Any adverse legislation against either must be condemned."

"This is from the Journeymen Horseshoers' Union:

"We feel that all people having arrived at the age of discretion should be left to exercise their own choice as to whether they shall use butter or oleomargarine. Therefore, be it

"Resolved by Journeymen Horseshoers' Union No. 40, of Columbus, Ohio, That as long as butterine is colored with a healthful ingredient said coloring should be encouraged, as it improves the appearance of the product; that we do most emphatically condemn the persecution being waged against the butterine industry; that we protest against the attempt to increase the tax thereon, and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to every Congressman, with the request that they each and every one exert the most strenuous efforts to crushingly defeat once and for all any and all measures providing for the further taxing of butterine."

"Here is something from the Painters and Decorators of Cleveland, Ohio. It speaks in very plain language. This is in the form of a letter, signed by Mr. Peter Hassenpflue, 442 Erie street, Cleveland, president of said union:

"I have been instructed by our union, containing over 400 members, to write and inform you that we are unanimously and bitterly opposed to the bills now pending in Congress providing for the persecution of the butterine industry. As you doubtless know, there are laws now that are being carefully enforced and lived up to that make it impossible for butterine to be manufactured and sold for anything else but butterine, and it is the unanimous opinion of our members that butterine made according to these laws is better for all uses than three-fourths of the butter that can be bought. It won't get strong, and it don't come from feverish cows that are full of disease germs, and butter frequently does."

"We feel this way—that if butterine is wrong, or poison, or liable to injure public health, then do away with it altogether; but if it is not (and years of experience in using it have taught us it is not), then why persecute the industry and keep passing laws against it? Our belief is that this is kept up just for political reasons, and that some people in Congress that are sworn to protect the rights and interests of all the people are willing to increase our already too high cost of living and add to our taxes just to catch the farmer vote and increase the business of the butter trust or trusts (and if butterine is killed they will soon be in one), and make them a present of the butter market, so they can either rob the people or make them go without butter. It is the rankest kind of injustice to kill one industry that is right and legitimate in order to accommodate another. We want butterine; we know what it is; we would rather have it than butter, and it is an outrage, in order to gratify the people who make butter, that we should have to go without it and pay two prices for butter which we are compelled by law to eat, and which, nine cases out of ten, is not fit for human use."

"It is getting to be pretty serious when the Congress of the United States is asked to go into the business of booming certain interests, and for their accommodation driving their competitors out of existence simply because they are competitors, and for no other reason on earth. A great deal is being said about butterine being a certain color. Now, the only reason that a kick is made on that color is because it helps to sell that commodity. If the butterine makers were to use red or black or blue, these patriotic statesmen, and others so solicitous for the people's protection, would raise no objection, because that would make the same point that they want to make by law, and that is to hurt its sale and thereby tickle the farmers and advance the interests of the creamery trusts. The ingredient used in butterine which gives it its color has been proven by official chemical analysis to be a natural and healthful product. As there is no reason to kill butterine but because it hurts another business, then why not do away with these hose-painting machines because they hurt our business?

"We know it would be unreasonable to ask this, but it would be no more so than for butter makers to try, as they are doing, to drive butterine out of existence because it hurts their business."

"I will close by saying that we consider any further legislation by Congress tampering with the butterine business as a prostitution of that dignified body to the greed and avarice of certain corporations and individuals, at our sacrifice and that of the people in general who don't own farms or creamery factories; and in the name of my union, under its seal, and by its unanimous instruction, I earnestly request you do everything you can to defeat all measures that provide for the increase in the tax of or further interference with the manufacture or sale of butterine."

"From the Chicago Federation of Labor:

"CHICAGO, March 21, 1900.

"Hon. WILLIAM MCALISTER.

"DEAR SIR: The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Chicago Federation of Labor at regular meeting, Sunday, February 4, and I was instructed to forward a copy of same to you:

"Whereas the Chicago Federation of Labor is deeply interested in and desires to encourage every legitimate industry which furnishes employment to the laboring classes; and

"Whereas efforts are being attempted by contemplated legislation at Washington to destroy the manufacture and sale of butterine, thereby displacing large numbers of the industrial element and preventing them from gaining a livelihood as well as the use of an article of food which has received the highest testimonials of every chemist in this country and the indorsement of every standard work that treats on the subject of hygiene; and

"Whereas we believe the efforts to place a tax of 10 cents per pound on colored butterine is inspired by selfish motives, so that the manufacturers of butter may charge an unreasonable price for their commodity and enable the large creameries to establish surely and securely a butter trust which may raise prices as their cupidity may dictate; and

"Whereas justice demands equal rights for both manufacturers of butter and butterine, both products having equal merit, any adverse legislation against either must be condemned; and

"Whereas the late published reports furnished to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury prove the legitimate and growing demand for butterine, and disclose the large amount of revenue derived therefrom; and

"Whereas we believe that the present Federal law taxing butterine 2 cents per pound and the additional regulations imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are sufficient to properly regulate the manufacture and sale of butterine: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the representatives of the industrial classes in Chicago, and voicing, as we know we do, the sentiments of the mechanic and the laborer throughout the country, protest against the passage of the Tawney, Grout, or any other bills that have for their object the further increase of tax or the relegating to the different States the right to enact laws that are opposed to the interests of the people and in no way in harmony with the inventive and progressive spirit of the age; and be it further

"Resolved, That we instruct our secretary to have sufficient copies of these resolutions printed that one be mailed to every Senator and Congressman in Washington and one to each of the labor organizations affiliated with the Federation of Labor, requesting them to indorse same or pass others of a similar character, so that a full expression of our condemnation of such legislation may be made known."

"Respectfully submitted.

"WALTER CARMODY,

"Secretary Chicago Federation of Labor."

"BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL,

"Cleveland, Ohio, April 27, 1900.

"DEAR SIR: The Building Trades Council of Cleveland, Ohio, and vicinity, representing over 5,000 mechanics, has by unanimous vote indorsed the action of the Chicago Federation of Labor and all the other labor organizations who are so doing in opposing the persecution of the butterine industry.

"We can not see any justification in placing a larger or, in fact, any tax on butterine or oleomargarine. The article is sold on its merits, and it would rather hurt than help its sale to attempt to sell it for butter, as it is more popular and generally regarded as more healthy than butter. Any of our people that may not want butterine can, while it is on the market, buy butter at a reasonable price, but if the attempt to kill it by legislation is successful, the butter manufacturers will have no competitors, and the result will be that the present butter trust will absorb the butter industry and control the purchase of milk by having little creameries in every farming locality on the plan of the Standard Oil Company, and we will have the pleasure of paying 50 or 60 cents per pound for butter or going without it altogether, the chances being in favor of the latter.

"We feel that as butterine is demanded and sold for what it is, and as the laws regulating its manufacture and sale are operating successfully in preventing its adulteration, that the legislative bodies of our country have gone as far as they have any right to go, and that further interference on their part is persecution and intended to advance private interests at the expense of the rights of the people.

"There is undoubtedly political motive behind all this.

"There are a hundred different cases in which legislative vigilance could protect the people from adulterated foods where such vigilance is not exercised, or if in any remote way ever applied it is not being taken advantage of by the officials supposed to enforce it; and why? Simply because the manufacturers of adulterated foods or the beneficiaries of their existence have no influential competitors to be served by their suppression.

"Butterine has been the victim of legislative attacks for a number of years, and we feel it is now time to let up on it and devote the effort wasted in the persecution of this legitimate industry to some more worthy cause in the protection of the real interests of the people.

"There is an old saying that 'He who is bent on an evil deed is never lacking for an excuse,' and it is certainly applicable in this case, the excuse being that it is wrong to color butterine because it is likely to be sold as butter, whereas, in fact, owing to the extreme popularity of the former, there is more liability of an attempt being made by some butter manufacturer to imitate it, and the only reason why an attempt is made to prevent the use of the material in butterine imparting color to it is to hurt its sale, as it has been proven this material is perfectly healthy. And where is the justice of prohibiting its use simply because it helps the sale of an honest product?

"As long as the people want butterine and it is good to use, as the Government chemists have proven, why should it be abolished? We can not see that there is need to say more. You can not but see the rank injustice of this whole business, and we would therefore earnestly request, in the name of common American justice, that you would strenuously oppose and exert every means in your power to defeat all such legislation.

"This letter has the hearty indorsement of our body, and as a testimony of which it bears our seal.

"W. C. DAVIS, President.

"GRANT MORGAN, Secretary."

The minority insert here, as a part of their report, the views of the minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, which is as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

"The minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives beg leave to submit the accompanying bill, which we offer as a substitute for H. R. 3717, known as the Grout bill.

"We first wish to bring to the attention of the House proof positive that oleomargarine is a wholesome and nutritious article of food and is therefore entitled to a legitimate place in the commerce of our country. In substantiation of this statement we beg to submit the following testimony taken before the committee:

"OPINIONS OF LEADING SCIENTISTS.

"Prof. C. F. Chandler, professor of chemistry at Columbia College, New York, says: 'I have studied the question of its use as food, in comparison with the ordinary butter made from cream, and have satisfied myself that it is quite as valuable as the butter from the cow. The product is palatable and wholesome, and I regard it as a most valuable article of food.'

"Prof. George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania, says: 'Butterine is, in my opinion, quite as valuable as a nutritive agent as butter itself. It is perfectly wholesome, and is desirable as an article of food. I can see no reason why butterine should not be an entirely satisfactory equivalent for ordinary butter, whether considered from the physiological or commercial standpoint.'

"Prof. Henry Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, New Jersey, says: 'I am able to say with confidence that it contains nothing whatever which is injurious as an article of diet, but, on the contrary, is essentially identical with the best fresh butter, and is superior to much of the butter made from cream alone which is found in the market. The conditions of its manufacture involve a degree of cleanliness and consequent purity in the product such as are by no means necessarily or generally attained in the ordinary making of butter from cream.'

"Prof. S. W. Johnson, director of the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station and professor of agricultural chemistry in Yale College, New Haven, says: 'It is a product that is entirely attractive and wholesome as food, and one that is for all ordinary and culinary purposes the full equivalent of good butter made from cream. I regard the manufacture of oleomargarine as a legitimate and beneficent industry.'

"Prof. S. C. Caldwell, of Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., says: 'While not equal to fine butter in respect to flavor, it nevertheless contains all the essential ingredients of butter, and since it contains a smaller proportion of volatile fats than is found in genuine butter, it is, in my opinion, less liable to become rancid. It can not enter into competition with fine butter, but so far as it may serve to drive poor butter out of the market, its manufacture will be a public benefit.'

"Prof. C. A. Goessman, of Amherst Agricultural College, says: 'Oleomargarine butter compares in general appearance and in taste very favorably with the average quality of the better kinds of dairy butter in our markets. In its composition it resembles that of ordinary dairy butter, and in its keeping quality, under corresponding circumstances, I believe it will surpass the former, for it contains a smaller percentage of those constituents which, in the main, cause the well-known rancid taste and odor of a stored butter.'

"Prof. Charles P. Williams, professor in the Missouri State University, says: 'It is a pure and wholesome article of food, and in this respect, as well as in respect to its chemical composition, fully the equivalent of the best quality of dairy butter.'

"Prof. J. W. S. Arnold, professor of physiology in the University of New York, says: 'I consider that each and every article employed in the manufacture of oleomargarine butter is perfectly pure and wholesome; that oleomargarine butter differs in no essential manner from butter made from cream. In fact oleomargarine butter possesses the advantage over natural butter of not decomposing so readily, as it contains fewer volatile fats. In my opinion oleomargarine is to be considered a great discovery, a blessing for the poor, and in every way a perfectly pure, wholesome, and palatable article of food.'

"Prof. W. O. Atwater, director of the United States Government Agricultural Experiment Station at Washington, says: 'It contains essentially the same ingredients as natural butter from cow's milk. It is perfectly wholesome and healthy and has a high nutritious value.'

"Prof. Henry E. Alvord, formerly of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, and president of the Maryland College of Agriculture, and now Chief of the Dairy Division of the United States Department of Agriculture, and one of the best butter makers in the country, says: 'The great bulk of butterine and its kindred products is as wholesome, cleaner, and in many respects better than the low grades of butter of which so much reaches the market.'

"Prof. Paul Schweitzer, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry, Missouri State University, says: 'As a result of my examination, made both with the microscope and the delicate chemical tests applicable to such cases, I pronounce butterine to be wholly and unequivocally free from any deleterious or in the least objectionable substances. Carefully made physiological experiments reveal no difference whatever in the palatability and digestibility between butterine and butter.'

"Professor Wiley, Chief of the Division of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, also appeared before the committee and testified to the nutritive and wholesome qualities of oleomargarine.

"The Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate, in a report dated February 28, 1900, finds, from the evidence before it, 'that the product known commercially as oleomargarine is healthful and nutritious.'

"Dr. George M. Kober, professor of hygiene, Georgetown University, District of Columbia, says:

"As a teacher of hygiene, I have urged upon my students for years to bring the merits and nutritive value of this food stuff to the attention of the public, and in the interest of the wage-earners of this country to correct, as far as possible, the prejudice which has been created against the use of this product, provided always it is sold under its true name and at its real value. In this opinion I am glad to be supported by the highest scientific authorities in this country and abroad."

"Charles Harrington, assistant professor of hygiene in the medical school of Harvard University, in his Manual of Practical Hygiene, 1901, page 112, says:

"Oleomargarine has been misrepresented to the public to a greater extent, probably, than any other article of food. From the time of its first appearance in the market as a competitor of butter there has been a constant attempt to create and foster a prejudice against it as an unwholesome article made from unclean refuse of various kinds, a vehicle for disease germs, and a disseminator of tapeworms and other unwholesome parasites. It has been said to be made from soap grease, from the carcasses of animals dead of disease, from grease extracted from sewer sludge, and from a variety of other articles equally unadapted to its manufacture.

"The truth concerning oleomargarine is that it is made only from the cleanest materials in the cleanest possible manner, that it is quite as wholesome as butter, and that when sold for what it is and at its proper price it brings into the dietary of those who can not afford the better grades of butter an important fat food much superior in flavor and keeping property to the cheaper grades of butter which bring a better price. Oleomargarine can not be made from rancid fat, and in its manufacture great care must be exercised to exclude any material however slightly tainted.

"Judge Hughes, of the Federal court of Virginia, in a decision, says: 'It is a fact of common knowledge that oleomargarine has been subjected to the severest scientific scrutiny, and has been adopted by every leading government in Europe as well as America for use by their armies and navies. Though not originally invented by us, it is a gift of American enterprise and progressive invention to the world. It has become one of the conspicuous articles of interstate commerce and furnishes a large income to the General Government annually.'

"Believing that this testimony establishes beyond controversy that oleomargarine is a nutritious and wholesome article of food, the main question to be considered is the complaint that fraud is practiced in its sale.

"In this connection the minority directs attention to the fact that the charge of fraudulent sale is not made against the manufacturer. It is conceded that the manufacturers of oleomargarine make no effort to evade the existing law, but that their product is always so marked and branded as to advise the customer who buys direct from the manufacturer as to the nature of the product.

"It is charged, and doubtless truly, that the present law is violated by unscrupulous retailers. In view of these two facts, viz, that the manufacturer does not violate the law, and that by reason of his being constantly under the eye of Government inspectors there is no danger of his doing so, and that the retailer does violate the law (when it is violated), the minority holds that the only proper legislation is that which directs the penalties against the retailer and not against the manufacturer—in other words, against the man who commits the crime and not against the man who does not. H. R. 9206 violates this fundamental principle of equity and jurisprudence by directing its penalties against the manufacturer who is already surrounded by such restrictions as to effectually prevent even the attempt at fraud, while it in no way either diminishes the temptation or increases the difficulty involved in the violation of the law by the retailer.

"The fact just stated, that H. R. 9206 is directed against the manufacturer (who is not even charged with violating the law) and not against the retailer, through whom, if at all, the fraud is committed, seems to justify the conclusion that the real object of this measure is to prevent the use of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, and not merely to stop the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter. Indeed, the radical advocates of the legislation proposed by H. R. 9206 have not hesitated to declare that their wish and expectation is that the passage of this bill will result in seriously crippling the oleomargarine industry, and the elimination of oleomargarine from the market as a food product.

"In substantiation of this assertion we quote the following:

"Mr. Adams, pure-food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, said:

"There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business."

"Charles Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, in a letter to the Virginia Dairymen, dated May 18, 1900, writes:

"Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand."

"W. D. Hoard, ex-governor of Wisconsin, and president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

"To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation."

"And on January 13, 1902, in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, the same witness, replying to the question as to 'whether this bill (H. R. 9206—or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold,' said:

"In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax."

"In view of this testimony (and much more of a similar character might be cited) the minority feel amply warranted in claiming that the purpose of H. R. 9206 is to cripple the business of the legitimate oleomargarine manufacturers. In just the extent to which this purpose is realized Congress will be responsible—in the event of the passage of H. R. 9206—for injuring or ruining one American industry at the demand of another; a thing which, as all will concede, Congress ought not to do. The minority believe it to be class legislation of the most pronounced kind and would establish a precedent which, if followed, would create monopolies, destroy competition, and militate against the public good.

"THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

"The purpose of the substitute bill, offered by the minority, is not to prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine or its legitimate sale, but to prevent it from being fraudulently sold for butter. To accomplish this end it throws such safeguards about the retail sale of the article (the only operation in which, under existing law, it is possible for fraud to be committed) as, in our opinion, to entirely eliminate all possibility of fraud in such retail sales and compel all dealers in oleomargarine to sell for what it really is and not for butter. The substitute offered is really an amendment to sections 3 and 6 of the existing oleomargarine law. The annual licenses for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine ($600 for manufacturers, $480 for wholesalers, and $48 for retailers) are not lessened, while the penalties imposed for violation of the law are materially increased.

"The minority respectfully submit that the enforcement of these provisions would effectually eliminate all possibility of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, and that, in our opinion, is as far as Congress can legitimately go.

"One of the claims made by the friends of H. R. 9206 and similar measures is that it will protect the interests of the farmer. We call attention to the fact that every ingredient that enters into the manufacture of oleomargarine is as much a product of the farm as is butter, and that such ingredients are made more valuable on account of their use in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

"In support of this statement we cite the following resolution adopted by the National Live Stock Association at its meeting in Chicago, December 8, 1901:

"Resolved, That the National Live Stock Association, in convention assembled, representing more than $4,000,000,000 of invested capital, reiterates its former expressed disapproval of such class legislation as the old Grout bill, and we protest against the passage of any law of this nature, firmly believing that such legislation is unjust, unconstitutional, and unfair, and not to be tolerated in a free country."

"The National Live Stock Association is a voluntary organization, comprising 117 subordinate local organizations of the cattle, sheep, and swine raisers and breeders of 26 States and Territories of the Union and representing more than four billions of invested capital.

"The annual meeting at which the foregoing resolution was adopted was attended by 1,500 delegates, and we submit that the unanimous protest of the accredited representatives of substantially all the live-stock interests of the United States (except those engaged in the dairy business) is entitled to respectful consideration. Representatives of this association, and also representatives of the cotton industry, came before this committee and were unanimous in expressing the opinion that the enactment of such legislation as is contemplated by H. R. 9206 would lower the price of their products and materially damage their industry.

"The minority directs attention also to the significant fact that the passage of House bill 9206 (or similar measure) is demanded solely by the producers of butter and not by consumers, who might naturally be supposed to ask for protection from a fraudulent product if they felt themselves in need of it. On the contrary, the consumers, as represented by hundreds of labor organizations representing many thousands of workmen, have protested against the passage of this measure as one calculated to deprive them of a cheap, wholesome, and nutritious substitute for butter.

"The claim that the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine interferes with the growth and prosperity of the butter industry is not borne out by the evidence before the committee. Statistics show that the total manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States last year was 104,000,000 pounds, as against 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter. As to the amount of oleomargarine sold fraudulently, exact statistics can not, of course, be obtained, but it would certainly be a liberal estimate to place the sum of the fraudulent sales at 25 per cent of the total product. Is it reasonable to suppose that the price of the 26,000,000 pounds thus fraudulently sold materially affected the price of the 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter used? Even assuming that the total oleomargarine output was sold fraudulently, it yet represents so small a proportion (about 7 per cent) of the total amount of butter produced as to render it unlikely that it in any way reduced the average price of butter.

"And as further supporting the conclusion that the butter industry is not materially damaged by the sale of oleomargarine, the minority directs attention to the significant fact that those sections of our country which are most exclusively devoted to the dairy interests are blessed with the greatest prosperity, as brought out in the testimony of ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, before our committee, who said that a few years ago land was worth only $15 an acre in that State, but as the State began to be devoted more exclusively to the dairy interests land had rapidly appreciated in price, and that farmers had gotten out of debt, had paid their mortgages, and the land is now worth the sum of $80 per acre, this price averaging much higher than agricultural lands in other parts of the country.

"In conclusion, the members of the Committee on Agriculture who have joined in this minority report beg to assure the House and the country in the most solemn manner possible that it has been their earnest intention, and is now their determination, to do everything possible to be done to enforce the sale of oleomargarine as oleomargarine and to prevent its sale as butter. To prevent fraud and not to injure or hamper a legitimate industry has been and is our purpose. We believe that it ought to be the sole purpose of all legislation and the sole motive of all just men."

The bill recommended by the majority is, in the opinion of the minority, an unconstitutional measure in that it is class legislation. If it is designed as a revenue measure, then it would be unconstitutional, because it taxes one man for the benefit of another, which, according to the language of the Supreme Court, "is robbery under the form of law."

WM. B. BATE.
H. D. MONEY.
HENRY HETTFELD.
F. M. SIMMONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] whether he desires to go on this evening or if he will yield?

Mr. MONEY. No; I have no desire to go on at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Mississippi take the floor on the pending bill?

Mr. MONEY. I took the floor and yielded it that the report might be read, at the request from the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator from Mississippi holds the floor?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. I am ready to yield it to any one else who desires to go on.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 25, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 24, 1902.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Artillery Corps.

Lawrence Carter Crawford, at large, to be second lieutenant, March 18, 1902, vice Patterson, promoted.

George H. Terrell, of Texas, to be second lieutenant, March 18, 1902, vice Cassells, promoted.

William Scott Wood, of Virginia, to be second lieutenant, March 18, 1902, vice Wilbur, promoted.

CONSULS.

Hugo Muench, of Missouri, to be consul of the United States at Zittau, Saxony, vice Francis B. Gessner, removed.

William E. Alger, of Massachusetts, to be consul of the United States at Puerto Cortez, Honduras, to fill an original vacancy.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Harold P. Norton, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 26th day of October, 1901, vice Lieut. Commander Chauncey Thomas, promoted.

Lieut. Frank M. Bennett, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 28th day of December, 1901, vice Lieut. Commander John E. Roller, promoted.

Commander John D. Ford, to be a captain in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902, vice Capt. John F. Merry, retired.

Commander Charles R. Roelker, to be a captain in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902, vice Capt. John D. Ford, an additional number in grade.

Lieut. Commander Asher C. Baker, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902, vice Commander Lucien Young, an additional number in grade.

Lieut. Commander William H. H. Southerland, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902, vice Commander Charles R. Roelker, promoted.

Lieut. Thomas Snowden, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902, vice Lieut. Commander Lucien Young, promoted.

Lieut. Commander Charles E. Fox, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 16th day of March, 1902, vice Commander Frederick M. Symonds, promoted.

POSTMASTERS.

Margaret Miller, to be postmaster at Tuscaloosa, in the county of Tuscaloosa and State of Alabama, in place of Margaret Miller. Incumbent's commission expires March 31, 1902.

Jacob M. Alexander, to be postmaster at Dawson, in the county of Terrell and State of Georgia, in place of Jacob M. Alexander. Incumbent's commission expired March 21, 1902.

De Witt C. Cole, to be postmaster at Marietta, in the county of Cobb and State of Georgia, in place of De Witt C. Cole. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

James Bromilow, to be postmaster at Chillicothe, in the county of Peoria and State of Illinois, in place of James Bromilow. Incumbent's commission expired February 23, 1902.

James R. Morgan, to be postmaster at Maroa, in the county of Macon and State of Illinois, in place of James R. Morgan. Incumbent's commission expired February 18, 1902.

Milton A. Ewing, to be postmaster at Neoga, in the county of Cumberland and State of Illinois, in place of Milton A. Ewing. Incumbent's commission expired January 10, 1902.

Watson D. Morlan, to be postmaster at Walnut, in the county of Bureau and State of Illinois, in place of Watson D. Morlan. Incumbent's commission expired March 16, 1902.

James M. Hundley, to be postmaster at Summitville, in the county of Madison and State of Indiana, in place of James M. Hundley. Incumbent's commission expired January 10, 1902.

John McL. Dorchester, to be postmaster at Pauls Valley, in the Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory, in place of John McL. Dorchester. Incumbent's commission expired February 25, 1902.

Lewis B. Krook, to be postmaster at New Ulm, in the county of Brown and State of Minnesota, in place of John H. Wedden-dorf. Incumbent's commission expired March 4, 1902.

Leonard M. Sellers, to be postmaster at Cedar Springs, in the county of Kent and State of Michigan, in place of Leonard M. Sellers. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

Oscar J. R. Hanna, to be postmaster at Jackson, in the county of Jackson and State of Michigan, in place of Henry E. Edwards. Incumbent's commission expired January 21, 1902.

Sarah K. Travis, to be postmaster at Magnolia, in the county of Pike and State of Mississippi, in place of Sarah K. Travis. Incumbent's commission expired January 12, 1902.

Samuel J. Kleinschmidt, to be postmaster at Higginsville, in the county of Lafayette and State of Missouri, in place of Samuel J. Kleinschmidt. Incumbent's commission expired March 22, 1902.

Horace M. Wells, to be postmaster at Crete, in the county of Saline and State of Nebraska, in place of Horace M. Wells. Incumbent's commission expired March 16, 1902.

Josiah Ketcham, to be postmaster at Belvidere, in the county of Warren and State of New Jersey, in place of Josiah Ketcham. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

Fred A. Wright, to be postmaster at Glen Cove, in the county of Nassau and State of New York, in place of Fred A. Wright. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

Joseph Ogle, to be postmaster at Greenport, in the county of Suffolk and State of New York, in place of Joseph Ogle. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

Ada Hunter, to be postmaster at Kinston, in the county of Lenoir and State of North Carolina, in place of Ada Hunter. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

John H. Tripp, to be postmaster at Carrollton, in the county of Carroll and State of Ohio, in place of Fred W. McCoy. Incumbent's commission expired February 16, 1902.

Martin L. Miller, to be postmaster at Steubenville, in the county of Jefferson and State of Ohio, in place of Martin L. Miller. Incumbent's commission expired March 16, 1902.

John F. Keller, to be postmaster at Romney, in the county of Hampshire and State of West Virginia, in place of Mary Gibson. Incumbent's commission expired February 18, 1902.

Charles W. Adams, to be postmaster at Gillett, in the county of Teller and State of Colorado, in place of Maynard Gunsul, resigned.

Joseph A. Shriver, to be postmaster at Manchester, in the county of Adams and State of Ohio, in place of Wesley B. Lang, removed.

Arthur C. Cogswell, to be postmaster at Burke, in the county of Shoshone and State of Idaho. Office became Presidential October 1, 1901.

Charles W. Nugen, to be postmaster at Kimball, in the county of Brule and State of South Dakota. Office became Presidential January 1, 1902.

Charles H. Jones, to be postmaster at Arlington, in the county of Snohomish and State of Washington. Office became Presidential January 1, 1902.

CONFIRMATIONS.

CONSUL.

Hugo Muench, of Missouri, to be consul of the United States at Zittau, Saxony.

POSTMASTERS.

John M. Mull, to be postmaster at Morganton, in the county of Burke and State of North Carolina.

Benjamin F. Martin, to be postmaster at Marblehead, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts.

Isaac A. Macurda, to be postmaster at Wiscasset, in the county of Lincoln and State of Maine.

William F. Darby, to be postmaster at North Adams, in the county of Berkshire and State of Massachusetts.

Allison H. Fleming, to be postmaster at Fairmont, in the county of Marion and State of West Virginia.

H. A. Darnall, to be postmaster at Buckhannon, in the county of Upshur and State of West Virginia.

Abram P. Funkhouser, to be postmaster at Harrisonburg, in the county of Rockingham and State of Virginia.

James M. Leverett, to be postmaster at Winona, in the county of Montgomery and State of Mississippi.

L. S. Calfee, to be postmaster at Pulaski City, in the county of Pulaski and State of Virginia.

Fred C. Furth, to be postmaster at Pine Bluff, in the county of Jefferson and State of Arkansas.

J. G. Walser, to be postmaster at Lexington, in the county of Davidson and State of North Carolina.

Jerry P. Wellman, to be postmaster at Keene, in the county of Cheshire and State of New Hampshire.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, for four days, on account of a funeral in his city.

To Mr. SMITH of Illinois, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. YOUNG, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, this being, under the rules, the day appointed for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up, on behalf of that committee, the bill (H. R. 12086) to extend the time for the construction of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company is required to complete and put in operation its railway be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of twelve months from the 18th day of June, 1902.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

REPEAL OF WAR-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] allow this business to be suspended for a moment?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the bill to repeal war-revenue taxes is, I understand, on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments. I have had some conversation with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] upon the subject, and I would like to get the bill into conference. I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know whether the bill is here or not.

Mr. PAYNE. It is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have not had an opportunity to look at the amendments.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments will be reported.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I suggest that from the reading of the amendments in this way it is impossible for us to get a very intelligent understanding of their effect. If the object is to nonconcur in the amendments, I do not see the necessity of detaining the House by reading them. If the gentleman from New York desires to have the amendments go to a conference, I see no objection to the House nonconcurring without reading.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the further reading will be dispensed with, the amendments will be nonconcurring in, and a conference asked by the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee as conferees on the part of the House.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUDD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back to the House the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the legislative appropriation bill, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments in the legislative and judicial appropriation bill, and asks for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

WILLIAM DIX.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up the bill H. R. 11696.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to grant and convey unto William H. Dix, of the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, and his heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain lot of land in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, known upon the plat or plan of said city as lot No. 4 in square 1113, upon the payment by the said Dix into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of the Interior, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid by the said Dix for the said lot.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not upon the Private Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the bill just read be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, just a word as to this bill. This is a measure to quitclaim all interest or color of title held by the United States Government to a tract of land in the District of Columbia claimed by the proposed beneficiary of the bill. I will only say further about the bill that it is one of a class as to which the committees of both Houses have adopted a settled policy. The course proposed to be pursued in reference to it is approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the office of the Attorney-General of the United States, to which the bill has been referred. We have adopted this policy after thorough investigation and elaborate reports upon similar bills in recent sessions, the Secretary of the Interior being required to fix the amount which the party claiming the lands shall pay to the Government for the release of title. The interests of the Government are sufficiently safeguarded, and the bill, in my judgment, ought to pass.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to have some explanation of this bill. It seems to belong to a class. What is the class?

Mr. MUDD. I will call on the gentleman from Missouri, a member of the subcommittee on judiciary of the Committee on the District of Columbia to explain the bill. The bill was reported by his subcommittee.

Mr. COWHERD. This bill, as I remember it, has twice passed the House; certainly once. I know it passed the House in the last Congress, toward the close of the session, and failed in the Senate. This is one of those cases that arose out of the confusion of titles in very early times. The gentleman will remember, there have been several reports made to Congress of titles that the Government had a claim in, arising out of the transactions with Greenleaf and others. The attorney for the District of Columbia reports the Government has a claim, and in this bill we leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to say what is the value of the Government's claim, and the party proposes to pay whatever the Government fixes as the value of this claim, so that there is nothing lost to the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUDD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11099) to amend section 1189 of chapter 35 of "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11099. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, under the rule, I believe, these bills have to be read twice, and I ask unanimous consent that the first reading be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object. I would like to know what is in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1189 of chapter 35 of "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901 be, and the same is hereby, amended so that it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 1189. SALARY.—He shall receive an annual salary of $2,000, which shall include all fees and emoluments."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I would say in connection with this bill that it was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON], whom I do not see present. The only effect is to reinstate the salary of the warden of the District Jail to the amount at which it was fixed by act of Congress passed a year or two ago; but it was inadvertently repealed in the enactment of the code through an error of the clerk who copied the code, in copying from the old law instead of the law which had repealed it. The salary in the code, therefore, is $1,800. This man had been getting theretofore $2,000. It was not the intention of the codifiers to repeal the law, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have approved this proposition, and the committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill restoring the salary to what it was before—$2,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask if this is a unanimous report on the part of the District Committee?

Mr. MUDD. It is. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11099) to amend section 1189 of chapter 35 of an act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUDD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

JOHN Y. COREY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4366) granting a pension to John Y. Corey.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this request of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN DEAD BODIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MUDD. I now call up the bill (S. 2291) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent desecration of graves in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, created, in and for the District of Columbia, a board for the control of the dead human bodies hereinafter described, and for the distribution of such bodies among and to the schools in said District conferring the degree of doctor of medicine or doctor of dental surgery or both; the Post Graduate School of Medicine, incorporated by an act of Congress, approved February 7, 1896, entitled "An act to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia;" the medical school of the United States Army; the medical examining boards of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine-Hospital Service, and the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia. Said board shall be known as the Anatomical Board of the District of Columbia, and shall consist of the health officer of said District and two representatives from each school aforesaid actually engaged in teaching, to be selected by and from the faculty thereof in accordance with the by-laws of such faculty, except in the case of the medical school of the United States Army, the representatives from which shall be selected and detailed by the Surgeon-General of the Army. Said health officer shall call a meeting of said anatomical board for organization at a time and place to be fixed by said health officer as soon as practicable after the passage of this act. Said anatomical board shall have full power to establish by-laws for its government and to appoint and to remove proper officers and agents, and shall keep full and complete records of its transactions and of all material facts pertaining to the receipt and distribution of bodies. Said records shall be open at all times for inspection by any member of said anatomical board and by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia.

Sec. 2. That every public officer, agent, and servant, and every officer, agent, and servant of any and every almshouse, prison, jail, asylum, morgue, hospital, and other public institutions and offices having charge or control of dead human bodies requiring to be buried at public expense, shall notify said anatomical board, or such person as may be designated by the said board, whenever any dead human body comes into his possession, charge, or control for burial at public expense. And every such officer, agent, and servant shall, upon application by said anatomical board or its agent, without fee or reward, and complying with the laws and regulations governing the removal of dead human bodies in the District of Columbia, deliver every such body to said board and permit said board or its agent to take and remove the same. The notice aforesaid shall be given in writing and forwarded to said anatomical board within twenty-four hours after said officer, agent, or servant comes into possession, charge, or control of such body for burial, and shall include such material information as said board may designate. But no such body shall be delivered if the deceased person, during his last illness, without suggestion or solicitation, requested to be buried or cremated; or if within the time specified above and before the actual delivery thereof any person claiming to be and satisfying the officer in charge of such body that he is of kindred or is related by marriage to the deceased shall claim the said body for burial or cremation, or request in writing that it be buried at public expense; or if within the time specified above and before actual delivery any person claiming to be and satisfying the officer in charge of such body that he is a friend of the deceased arranges to have the same properly buried or cremated without expense to the District; or if the deceased person was a traveler who died suddenly; but in any such case said body shall be buried or delivered to said applicant for burial.

Sec. 3. That the said anatomical board may receive the bodies reported to it as aforesaid, and may distribute and deliver such as are received among and to such of the schools and boards entitled thereto as request in writing to receive the same, except as otherwise expressly directed in this act. Each such school and board shall receive annually, as nearly as may be practicable, such proportion of the entire number of bodies distributed as the number of students enrolled and in regular attendance at such school, and the number of candidates appearing for examination before such board, respectively, engaged bona fide at such school, or examined by said board in dissecting, and operative surgery on the cadaver, bears to the total number of students so enrolled in attendance, and engaged, and of persons so examined, in the District of Columbia. The secretary, dean, or other proper officer of each such school and board shall report to said anatomical board the names of all such students in attendance at such school or persons examined by said board, as the case may be, at such times and in such form as said board may direct. All bodies shall be delivered among such schools and boards in regular order so as to maintain, as nearly as may be practicable, an equitable allotment at all times; and bodies assigned to any school or board in regular order and refused by such school or board without sufficient cause shall be charged against the quota of such school or board in such manner as not to prejudice any other school or board. But no body shall be delivered to any school or board unless within not less than twenty-four hours prior to such delivery notice of the death has been given by said anatomical board to the nearest known kinsman, relative by marriage, or friend of the deceased, or if none such be known, published by said anatomical board at least once in a daily newspaper published in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. The notice required by this section shall be deemed to have been given if served in writing on the person to be notified, or if left at his usual place of residence with some adult person residing therein, or a member of the family of such person. Said board shall take receipts by name, or, if the name be unknown, by a description, for each body delivered; all receipts so obtained by said board shall be properly filed by it.

Sec. 4. That no school except the medical school of the United States Army shall receive any body under the provisions of this act until said school has given bond to the District of Columbia, and the Board of Commissioners of said District has approved such bond, which said bond shall be in the penal sum of $300 and conditioned that all bodies which said school shall receive shall be used in said District and only for the promotion of the science and art of medicine and dentistry.

Sec. 5. That it shall be the duty of each and every officer, agent, and employee of every school and board receiving bodies under the provisions of this act to see that such bodies are used in the District of Columbia and for the promotion of science and art of medicine and of dentistry, and for no other purpose whatsoever, and that after being so used the remains thereof are disposed of in accordance with law.

Sec. 6. That any person who shall, in the District of Columbia, sell or buy any body aforesaid, or in any way traffic therewith, or transmit or convey any such body to any place outside of said District, or cause or procure any such body to be so transmitted or conveyed, or who shall, in said District, disturb or remove, without legal permit, any body from any grave or vault, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not more than $200 or imprisoned in the workhouse of said District for not more than one year.

Sec. 7. That neither the United States nor the District of Columbia, nor any officer, agent, or servant thereof, shall be at any expense by reason of the delivery of any body or bodies aforesaid, except such as may be properly chargeable on account of bodies delivered to the medical school of the Army, the medical examining boards of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine-Hospital Service, and the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia; but all expenses of such delivery and distribution, except as hereinbefore specified, and of said anatomical board, shall be paid by the schools receiving such bodies, in such manner as may be specified by said board and by such school in proportion to the number of bodies which it has received; and no school which has failed or refused to pay its just proportion of such expense as determined by said board shall be allowed to receive any body or bodies, or parts thereof, while the amount so due remains unpaid.

Sec. 8. That any person having any duty enjoined upon him by the provisions of this act who willfully neglects, refuses, or fails to perform the same, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or by imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia for not more than one year.

Sec. 9. That all prosecutions under this act shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia, on information brought in the name of said District on its behalf.

Sec. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD].

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, this is the ordinary statute of most of the States, creating an anatomical board and providing for the disposition of the bodies of those who die in public charitable institutions, and so forth. Unless some one desires an explanation, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman how this bill compares with the statutes of the different States?

Mr. COWHERD. I have not personally compared it; but I am somewhat familiar with the statute in my own State. I know it is very much the same, but I have not compared it with the statutes of any other State. I think the statute of Missouri was framed upon that of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. McCALL. I am not familiar with that statute.

Mr. COWHERD. This bill creates a board composed of certain persons named in the bill, selected from the medical schools of the District, and the medical school of the Army, the post-graduate school of the District, and the medical examining boards of the Army, the Navy, and Marine-Hospital Corps. That board is to have charge of the bodies of persons who die in the almshouse, prison, jail, asylum, morgue, hospitals, and public charitable institutions and who are to be buried at public expense. Now, if those persons have any relatives or friends, notice must be given to them, and if any friend or relative objects, the body is not turned over to this board. If no one objects, it is then turned over, to be distributed to these schools pro rata. There is no expense to the District or the Government.

Mr. McCALL. While statutes of this kind may be common, yet upon the face of it it would strike one, in view of our present customs, as somewhat inhuman to provide for the dissection of the body of a person simply because he happened to die poor or in such an institution as that.

Mr. COWHERD. Yet the gentleman knows that prior to the creation of anatomical boards in the States the question of the robbing of graves had become a scandal in every large city in the Union, and yet it was an absolute necessity that the medical schools, for the protection of the living, should have some way of getting dead bodies for dissecting purposes. As a matter of fact, I think this system has proved very satisfactory in all the States where it has been tried.

I will ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUDD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MUDD. That is all the business which the District of Columbia has this morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 21) authorizing the printing of extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3136. An act for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10530) to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. VEST as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 4821) granting an increase of pension to Herbert A. Boomhower, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. GIBSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, MOSS V. RHEA, THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, KENTUCKY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business, which is the election case of Moss v. Rhea, Third district of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls up the unfinished business, being the election case of Moss v. Rhea. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the minority are very anxious to have the time for debate extended, in order to give additional time to the contestee to speak in his own behalf. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended one hour on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that time for debate on this election case be extended two hours, one hour upon each side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX].

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted it would not be possible for me to go into a complete discussion of all the facts of this case. I shall therefore omit from my remarks any reference in detail to the question which was so ably presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] on Saturday. I have to say upon that subject, however, that I fully indorse the contention of my colleague on the committee upon the proposition that there is not a single ballot before this House which can be considered for any purpose, because they are not identified in the manner prescribed by law. That position is sustained, as we insist, by three decisions of the supreme court of Kentucky and by the plain mandate of the statute itself, which specifically provides:

That if there are any ballots cast and counted or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of election, said ballots shall not be destroyed, but sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom.

But the gentlemen are not satisfied. They say that this House, borrowing its authority from that provision of the Constitution which declares that it is the exclusive judge of election and qualification of its own members, can so far stretch that principle that they can set aside the statutes of Kentucky and the decisions of its courts. And, sir, when they make that assertion and choose that as their battle ground, I desire to attack them in their own castle; to accept the gage of battle which they have laid down; to meet them upon the very issue which they have made, and I propose to discuss this case, in the thirty minutes allotted to me, upon the principles of law which are conceded by the majority in their report to be correct.

The ballots which were rejected, outside of 1 precinct in the county of Warren and 4 precincts in the city of Bowling Green, amount to nothing so far as this contest is concerned. There are 5 precincts in which almost every one of those rejected ballots can be found, and I will call attention to these 5 precincts. They are Electric Light precinct, No. 20, in which were 100 rejected ballots; Police Court Room precinct, in which were 41 rejected ballots; Gas House precinct, in which were 57 rejected ballots; County Court Room precinct, in which were 5 rejected ballots; Kister's Mill precinct, in which there were 112 rejected ballots, and Hazelip's Mill precinct, in which there were 23 rejected ballots.

All the balance of the rejected votes in the district would not amount to a difference of fifty. So that this case can be determined upon the evidence as it relates to four precincts in the city of Bowling Green and one precinct outside of the city, but in the same county. It has been charged against the position which we take here that our contention is a terrible indictment of the so-called Goebel election law, because they say that the counting or rejection of these ballots is a matter which was devolved upon the Democratic officials, who were in charge, as they allege, of every election precinct in that district, and who, if we are correct, can wrongfully reject the ballots in the first instance and then defeat a contest or a prosecution by fraudulently failing to make a proper certificate.

Mr. Speaker, if the proposition which they lay down had one single atom of truth to sustain it, it might be persuasive upon some members of this House; but I undertake to say, and an examination of this record will disclose, that there is not a scintilla of truth in the assertion of the majority that the Democrats had the control of the election judges in all the precincts, or even a majority of them, in dispute. Now, let me call the attention of this House to what the record in this case shows upon that subject.

In Electric Light precinct, where Mr. Rhea had 147 votes and Mr. Moss had 117, there were 100 rejected ballots. The Republicans were in control of that box. The Republican sheriff and Republican judge constituted the majority of the board in determining whether or not a ballot should be rejected. So that this case does not stand upon the proposition that a Democratic board has fraudulently rejected Republican ballots, but so far as this precinct is concerned the contention of the majority reduces itself to this, that Republican judges in a Democratic precinct fraudulently rejected Republican votes! Mr. Speaker, I denounce, on behalf of the Republican managers in Electric Light precinct, that libel upon their character and intelligence!

The next precinct to which I call your attention is Police Court precinct, No. 21. Mr. Rhea had 164 votes; Mr. Moss had 19. There were 41 rejected ballots; and the Republicans controlled that precinct. The contention is that the Republicans took away from Mr. Moss in that case enough votes to have changed the result.

In the Gas House precinct the Republicans were in control. There were 57 rejected ballots.

In Russells Lumber Yard precinct the Democrats were in control. There was not a single rejected ballot.

In the County Court Room precinct the Democrats were in control and there were only five rejected ballots.

In Kisters Mill precinct there were 112 rejected ballots, and the Democrats, as I understand, were in control.

In Hazelip's Mill precinct there were 23 rejected ballots, and the Republicans were in control.

So that I find in these four precincts in which the Republicans were in control there were 221 rejected ballots—enough to elect John S. Rhea half a dozen times over; and in the three precincts in Bowling Green in which the Democrats had a majority there were only 117, not enough to affect the result in any particular. This is the record.

Well, but they say that it does not matter whether these Republicans came in there and defrauded Moss of his seat or whether the Democrats did it. They say if it was done, and that it is evident in this case that it was, that it does not make any difference who did it.

Now, I want to apply their contention to the facts in this record and see if there is one scintilla of evidence, verbal or written, in this record that will support the assertion that either the Republican or Democratic officials wrongfully deprived the contestant of any ballots to which he was lawfully entitled. I want to call attention to the argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Judge SMITH], a man for whom I have the highest respect. Judge SMITH, in the colloquy in which I was engaged with him on Saturday, when I put the proposition to him as to what would prevent the Republican judges from signing this certificate and calling upon their Democratic brethren to join them in signing it and then if the Democrats did not consent to do so to mandamus them, tried to get out of it as follows: "Why," he said, "because when you take the case into court you lose control of the ballots and you can not follow them up." And here is the language of the gentleman from the RECORD:

The object of this law, according to the contention on the other side, is to identify these ballots; and if they are not identified from the very hour of the election the identification is worthless, as the gentlemen well know.

I say amen to his proposition; but the fault of his logic is this: That in the mandamus proceedings suggested the ballots would go to the same clerk, a Republican clerk, as they would if there were no mandamus proceedings instituted. It would be simply a question whether that clerk would hold the ballots in one capacity or hold the same ballots in a different capacity. It would be the same question as whether he held these ballots in his right hand or in his left.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to go further. The gentleman says, and correctly says, that he has got to account for these ballots for every hour of the time when they leave the ballot box until they get into the hands of the county clerk. That is his contention. He is correct in that. Now, I hold in my hand the record in this case, and I say that in not one of these precincts, not a single precinct, have they accounted for these ballots in the hands of these managers and traced them to that clerk. Not only they have not accounted for them for every hour, but they have not accounted for them for a single hour of the time when the election closed to the time, several days later, when they reached the hands of the county clerk.

Why do I say that? In the Kisters Mill precinct there were 112 rejected ballots. There was not a single judge, not a single clerk, not a single sheriff, who testified as to where those ballots were or what was done with them between the 6th and the 9th day of November. There was not one of the officers that went on the stand to testify to anything concerning them; and yet, while the statute plainly provides that these ballots shall be inclosed in a linen bag and sealed with wax, and the county seal impressed on the wax, and the names of all the election officials plainly written thereon; the following statement is taken from a stenographic report on these ballots, dictated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]: "The envelope bears evidence of having possibly been sealed with a paster on top of the flap, but the paster bears no indorsement and was not signed by any of the election officers, and the names of the election officers do not appear on any place on the linen envelope. The envelope has never been sealed with sealing wax."

Now, this is a stenographic report dictated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the author of the majority report in this case, the gentleman who has led the fight here, and the omission in that one election precinct will save the seat to John S. Rhea. Neither one of these election officials was examined.

In the Gas House precinct, No. 22, where there were 57 rejected ballots, there was not examined any of the officers to prove the possession of those ballots and trace them into the hands of the county clerk.

In the Electric Light precinct, where there were 100 rejected ballots, there is not a scintilla of evidence that gets them away from the precinct officials to the county clerk, except the statement of the clerk that on the 9th day of November he received them from some official, he does not pretend to say who. That is all there is about it, and that is all there is of it. And yet upon this record it is contended that they have traced these ballots and accounted for them for every hour from the time they were cast until they were supposed to reach the county clerk.

Now, the gentlemen feel that they have got so weak a case upon the facts that they must go down into the very grave; they are not satisfied to go into an ordinary grave, but they must go down into a grave that was dug by an assassin's hand, and from that grave they must dig up something that will appeal to the prejudice of the members on the opposite side of this House.

Mr. Speaker, William Goebel is dead, and it is not for me to be his eulogist. It has been said, in the language of the immortal poet:

The evil that men do lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones.
So let it be with Cæsar.

I will not, sir, in this presence undertake to eulogize or to laud or to praise that mighty man of the people who met so untimely an end; but I do deplore that in this presence it was thought to be necessary by this majority to speak evil of the dead in order to bolster up this flimsy case and turn out this man who was honestly elected. I do say that it is pretty bad that they have got to go down into the grave of a man slain by an assassin in order to appeal to the prejudice of the members of this House.

While I need not and will not defend William Goebel, I want briefly, in the little time that is left to me, to call attention to one proposition. It has been said that the election law of Kentucky, under which this election was held, is one of the best passed by any State in this Union. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] said that he believed it was the very best that he had seen, because it was one of the latest and they had the advantage of comparison with all the other States. This election was held under the provisions of that law, and the provisions of the Goebel amendment to that law, so far as it affects this case, had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BOWIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I did not state that the election law was one which could be approved, but that the ballot law was one which could be approved.

Mr. BOWIE. Well, all right; I will let it stand at that. I have no time to look into the RECORD, and I will accept the gentleman's statement.

Now, let us consider the fine-spun distinction which the gentleman tries to draw between the ballot law and the election law. What is the Goebel law, which has been so maligned? Why, sir, before the Goebel law was enacted any county judge in a county of Kentucky could appoint the managers of elections, even though he was a candidate himself, and he had no associate with him. If he were a Republican he could appoint all the managers; if he were a Democrat he could appoint them all. The Goebel law changed that, so that in every county in Kentucky no man who was a candidate at an election could sit as an election commissioner; and under its provisions two of the election commissioners were of one party and one of the other in every county of the State.

Mr. LANDIS. Who recommended the member who represented the minority party?

Mr. BOWIE. There is no provision for that.

Mr. LANDIS. And the result was that the appointee was really some weak-kneed Republican—some Republican selected by a Democrat; was it not?

Mr. BOWIE. No, sir; I deny that.

Mr. LANDIS. In your district, if minority representation were given, would you consent to have the election board selected by Republicans of your district?

Mr. BOWIE. I deny that anything of that kind has happened in Kentucky.

Mr. LANDIS. It is true; all over Kentucky.

Mr. BOWIE. I deny it.

Mr. FOX. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] that there is not the slightest complaint on the part of the majority of the committee of any fraud of that sort. There is no allegation of that kind in the case.

Mr. BOWIE. Now, allow me just a word further.

According to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his opening speech last Saturday, there have been four election contests from Kentucky in which the issue of fraud was raised before this House—a Republican House—and each one of those contests, on the merits and facts of the case, was decided in favor of the Democrat—every one under this Goebel law. If the parties could not get a fair trial in the State of Kentucky, they certainly could get a fair trial in this House; and on a fair trial in this House every case that came here has been decided, so far as the question of fraud is concerned, in favor of the Democratic candidate.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman does not mean to say that four of those contests from Kentucky arose under the Goebel law?

Mr. BOWIE. Three of them did, I should have said.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman said "four." I presume he meant there were four contests from Kentucky, but not four under the Goebel law.

Mr. BOWIE. Three under the Goebel law, I believe, and all three of them, so far as the question of fraud was concerned, were decided in favor of the Democratic candidate.

Now, another thing. It is charged that in the county of Logan there was an unfair division of the election officials in the last election. Yet the report of the majority of the committee shows that, though more than 6,000 votes were polled in that county, only one ballot was changed, where the Democrats, as claimed, had the majority of the managers or judges. "The proof of the pudding is the chewing of the bag." That is the record as it appears in this House.

But the Goebel election law has nothing to do whatever with this case. In the county of Warren—in four out of five precincts upon which this case turns—the Republicans had the majority of the judges of elections; and it is the action of the Republican majority that is sought to be reviewed and set aside in this case. That is the case as it stands.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before my colleague closes will he allow me a question?

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Are we to understand that there is no contention in this case as to the fact that the Republican judges were satisfactory to the Republican candidates?

Mr. BOWIE. There is not a particle of contention that the Republicans were dissatisfied with the election managers in the county of Warren, upon which this case turns. In the county of Logan, the only county in which they expressed dissatisfaction, out of 6,000 votes this committee, upon a month's consideration of this case, are able to find only one doubtful vote, which they give to Mr. Moss.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One other question. In order to unseat the sitting member in this case is it necessary to count ballots that a Republican board in Warren County refused to count?

Mr. BOWIE. Absolutely so in 4 precincts—not 1, but 4 of them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask who selected the so-called Republican boards in Warren County?

Mr. BOWIE. They were selected by a board composed of two Democrats and one Republican, and no living man questioned the fairness of them; no man questioned their Republicanism—not a single man—and you do not question it in your report in this case.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is it not a fact that they refused to appoint the Republicans that the Republican organization recommended?

Mr. BOWIE. They pretended that was the fact in the county of Logan, as I have said, and after one month's work on this case they found one ballot which they could change out of 6,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In Warren County they made no contention.

Mr. BOWIE. Never.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman state to this House that in Warren County they appointed the persons nominated by the Republican organization?

Mr. BOWIE. I will state to this House that in Warren County there was not a question raised by either side but what the Republicans got exactly what they wanted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman then declines to answer the question.

Mr. BOWIE. I only go upon this record. I do not know what they may have said outside of this record. I say that neither by the testimony in the record, nor by the argument of counsel, nor by the report, which you had the honor to sign, was there a suspicion cast upon the good faith and the honor and the integrity and the Republicanism of the Republican managers in these precincts where they set aside these votes. That is what I say, and that is my contention, and it is their action which you are undertaking to annul and declare void.

Mr. FOX. How much time has the gentleman consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-eight minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, in the examination of this case I think I have tried to determine what was right. I knew nothing of either the contestant or the contestee until I met them before the committee. I would not do either of them an injustice. I went into the examination of this case with the same spirit, the same desire to do justice, and the same determination to ascertain who was in fact elected that animated and controlled me in the examination of the case of Spears against Burnett, where I reported last Saturday in favor of the Democratic contestee. And having examined it fully and carefully I came to the conclusion—and I know something of election contests—that the contestant in this case had received an honest majority of the votes cast in his district, and that if the election officers had done their duty, if they had obeyed and complied with the constitution and the statutes of Kentucky, even under this Goebel law, which gentlemen on the Democratic side have told so much about and eulogized, that the certificate would have been issued to him, and that it was only by a violation of their duty and their oaths in refusing to count ballots that under the decision of the supreme court of the State of Kentucky should have been counted for contestant that the certificate was given by them to the contestee.

Now, I care not myself whether the election officers that were thus guilty were Democrats, as was true in some cases, or at least a majority Democrats, or whether there were but one Democrat and two Republicans of that peculiar stamp that the Democratic county election officers deemed it safe and advisable to select—it does not in the least mitigate the fraud.

Mr. BOWIE. What do you think under the old law of the Democrats of that peculiar stamp where a Republican county judge would select them all?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I apprehend that when a Republican county judge selected he would select fairly. I have never heard that he did not. If I am not mistaken, the record shows we had but two Republican sheriffs in all the precincts, and he has the controlling vote.

Mr. BOWIE. What is that?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. That was in Logan County, I believe.

I know also that it was contended before the committee, and I think appears in the records, and it was not denied at the hearing, and that it was the law, which was changed afterwards, because its injustice and unfairness was so manifest that at the time of this election the county election board, consisting of a majority of Democrats, selected as Republican judges and sheriffs, not the men that had been presented by the Republicans or by the minority, as is the general practice in other States, but such persons as they saw fit to call and to designate as Republicans.

Mr. BOWIE. Where was this county—what county is that you speak of, where they only selected such men as they chose to?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I say that the law gave them that power, and I think my charge is true of every county.

Mr. BOWIE. Do you say there is anything of that sort done in Warren County?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not know that there is any special evidence as to their proceedings in Warren County, but it is common knowledge that they proceeded in that way everywhere.

Mr. BOWIE. I say, Mr. Speaker, there is not a particle of evidence of that sort.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The law permitted them to select the Republicans that they saw fit to choose. The law under which this election was held, and which had been repealed, but which remained in force until this election was held, did not permit the Republicans or any minority party to present the name of a man who was to represent them on that board, and if you will let the opposing party in almost any State select as the Democratic members of a board those whom I choose to call Democrats and to have them act as they did in all the precincts—men in many cases unfit, and who knew nothing about the laws of election—I think it will have no great trouble to get votes not counted or thrown out as they were in this case.

Now, right here, to illustrate it, let me take a precinct and read the evidence upon this point in this case. In one of the precincts Mr. Downer was tendered as a witness. He was a Republican sheriff that they saw fit to appoint in a precinct where they transferred 25 votes from Moss to Rhea, and I shall come to that by and by. Now, what does he say about it? He says, first, that he had never acted upon an election board before; second, that he did not believe what was proposed to be done was right, but that they had some whisky there and that the Democratic clerk, Mr. Wright, after a time declared that if he did not sign these returns so and so, as these certain little marks vitiated the votes, then he would not make up the report or sign it, and he said he thought it was best to do it rather than to have any fuss. That was one of the Republican officers that this Democratic county election board gave us in the very few places where we had a majority of the board.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to say for Mr. Downer that he is as upright and reputable a citizen as there is in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, although he is a Republican.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. That may be, but I can read what he said.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There is no better man in Kentucky than Mr. Downer.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am telling you what Mr. Downer said. Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Anyone in that country who knows Mr. Downer would resent any reflection made upon him.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am not making any reflection upon Mr. Downer, but I doubt very much indeed if Mr. Downer, never having acted on an election board before, understood, as he says he did not, what had been decided by the supreme court of Kentucky, that certain marks upon a ballot should not prevent that ballot from being counted, and therefore it was very easy for these other men who did understand it to press him in after a time and have him sign the returns, as they had wrongfully made them.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Downer is one of the most intelligent and one of the best citizens in that whole section.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not know how that may be.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If you go down there you will find out how that is.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Let us take that vote in that precinct, for there were 25 ballots peculiarly dealt with. Let us see what Mr. Downer says. There is where this clerk—Mr. Wright—obtained a dry stencil; went into the booth and got it, and placed a little impression, so slight that you could hardly see it, upon somewhere from 25 to 40 Republican votes, marked and voted for the Republican candidates, and then had them counted for Rhea.

Mr. FOX. That does not appear in the record, does it?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am going to read it and show it. If I do not read it, then we will say it does not appear.

Mr. FOX. Is there a syllable of testimony in the record that the clerk put that mark there?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Well, we will see when we get to it. There was where we took our judge, for each judge has a key to the box, and went and asked the contestee to bring the Democratic judge and have the box opened, and he would not do it, for the purpose of examining these votes that had been thus treated. Now, let us see what the evidence is.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman—

Mr. POWERS of Maine. One moment. Let us see what the evidence is.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You speak of their refusing to open the box. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows that the law of Kentucky absolutely precludes the opening of these ballots that have been counted, except in case of a contest?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Well, here was a case of contest.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Not a contest over those ballots.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Yes, there was; over these identical ballots that the mark had been placed on.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, but the ballots, as I understand, had been counted as valid and sealed up inside of the ballot box.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Yes, but there was a contest over them as to these 25 votes, and we have it here. Let us see what they did. First, Mr. Downer, who is such an excellent gentleman—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, he is a good man—

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Downer swears, in his testimony, as follows:

17. Q. State if during the day you saw the clerk go into one of the booths and take anything therefrom, and what he said, if anything.

A. I think it was about 10 o'clock in the morning. Of course, I could not see what he took, but he went into one of the booths, and when he came out he had something in his hand that looked like a stencil, and was picking on the point of the stencil, and he stated while picking on the point of the stencil that some of these damn voters had been pressing on it so hard they had pushed the rubber up in the instrument, and remarked also that "I will just take the stencil from the one uppermost this way, that they are not using, and put it in the one that they got this one that was damaged from and try to repair this one."

He next asks:

28. Q. What names were marked besides those under the log cabin?

A. Rhea and Gorin.

29. Q. Was the stencil mark under the log cabin and that opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin of similar character and distinct?

A. No, sir; the one under the cabin was plain and distinct and the other very indistinct.

30. Q. Who called attention to these marks opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin?

A. The clerk, Mr. Wright.

31. Q. Did you notice these marks yourself?

A. I never would have discovered them unless you put them right up between the eye and the light; there was no ink on them.

That is, the 25 votes or 40 votes, as others suggest.

31½. Q. You say there was no ink on the stencil?

A. I could not discover any.

32. Q. Describe the condition and appearance of these marks under the cabin and opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin.

(Counsel for contestee object to the foregoing questions because the ballots are still in existence and show for themselves as to the condition of the stencil mark.)

These are the ballots that they would not let us get at.

A. Well, it appeared to me that it was pressed on just by hard pressure with the hand. Just looked like you had taken a stencil and pressed on it with your hand and left an indentation.

33. Q. Was this the appearance also of the stencil mark under the cabin?

A. No, sir; that was perfectly distinct, with ink.

Under this dry-pressure scheme, so difficult to detect, they counted for Mr. Rhea instead of Mr. Moss from 25 to 41. This shows how near we bring it to the clerk and he does not deny it, nor does contestee take his deposition to refute the natural presumption. But I will also read some more of it.

34. Q. Who was the first person to notice these different ballots?

A. Mr. Wright.

35. Q. Was any objection made to counting them?

A. Yes, sir; they all objected, all the Republicans.

36. Q. Why were they counted?

A. Well, the clerk claimed that anything that indicated that there had been an effort to make a mark there would have to go.

37. Q. For whom were these ballots counted?

A. For Mr. Rhea and Gorin, and for the Republican electors, and Yerkes.

38. Q. What was done with these ballots that were stamped under the device of the log cabin and opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin?

A. They were placed aside when we began to count up the result of the different candidates.

39. Q. After the count was made in what bag or receptacle were they placed?

A. The one prepared by the officers or sheriff to inclose them in.

40. Q. Were they placed in the sack marked and sealed up as ballots that were counted as valid, or among the questioned or rejected ballots?

A. They placed them in among the counted ballots, I think.

41. Q. Do you know where they are now?

A. We took them after the thing was over that night and delivered them to the clerk—I have not seen them since—the county clerk.

Then he was cross-examined by Mr Sandidge, counsel for contestee.

27. Q. Did I understand you to say that there was no ink marks in the square opposite the name of Mr. Rhea and the name of Mr. Gorin?

A. I could not discover any; I have reference to those that were disputed about.

28. Q. What was the number of those in which you could discover no stencil mark?

A. I think there were 41, if my memory serves me.

Others did not make it so many; so we have placed it in our report at 25.

29. Q. Why didn't you have those ballots returned as contested or questioned ballots?

A. Well, Mr. Wright stated that he would refuse to sign the thing unless we allowed them to go.

Mr. Wright, who is the clerk, stated that he would refuse to sign it unless they let them go.

30. Q. Why didn't you refuse to sign them if they did allow them to go?

A. Well, that might have been a question, but we concluded to let them go.

31. Q. You didn't believe, then, if I understand you, that these ballots had been voted for Mr. Rhea and Mr. Gorin?

A. We had our doubts about it.

32. Q. Notwithstanding this you signed the returns and swore to it, stating that Mr. Rhea and Mr. Gorin had both received these votes?

A. I don't understand it that way. We came as near to an agreement as we could, and we all signed with that understanding.

33. Q. You didn't ever have them returned among the contested or questioned ballots, did you?

A. I don't remember distinctly now all the classifications that were made, but I know we came as near to an agreement as we could and signed them.

I want to show you how this Mr. Wright managed it, and that the Republicans never had anything to do with this matter.

Here is the deposition—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Are you going away from this particular question?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am going to read on the same question.

Here is the deposition of R. C. Causey.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. He was a Republican.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. He was a Republican—sheriff.

33. Q. How many that were not counted?

A. Forty-one.

35. Q. In examining these ballots did you find any ballots with the stencil mark under the log cabin, and then marked for anyone else under any other device?

A. Yes, sir; not under any other device. I believe there was one ballot in the whole lot that was that way, but there were Republican ballots that I didn't call a stencil mark opposite the name of Rhea and George Gorin—just like you take a stencil and press down and make an impression without any ink.

36. Q. Do you know how many of these ballots there were?

A. I think there were 33—I think it was. I did have a statement of it, but I gave it to some one the night of the election, and I have not seen it since.

37. Q. Was the stencil mark on these ballots under the log cabin, and that opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin equally distinct, or what was the difference between the stencil mark under the log cabin and that opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin?

A. The stencil mark in the device was plain under the log cabin, and that opposite Mr. Rhea's name and Mr. Gorin just look like you had taken a stencil without any ink and made an impression on the paper. Could not have been done with anything else, I don't think.

38. Q. Was that distinct or very indistinct?

A. Very indistinct.

39. Q. Was it distinct enough that you could see it with your natural eye, or you have to use your glasses?

A. I had to use my glasses, and some of them I could not see it then; only they said they could see it.

40. Q. Who called attention first to these marks opposite the name of Rhea and Gorin?

A. Mr. Wright.

41. Q. What did he say about them?

A. He contended that they were made after the stencil on the long cabin, but not enough ink on it to make it plain.

42. Q. Made after the long cabin, but not enough ink to make it plain?

A. Yes, sir. He tried to show me the shape of the stencil on the paper, but wherever it was pressed hard enough it always made a print.

43. Q. Did it appear from any of these marks that there was any ink on the stencil?

A. No, sir.

44. Q. Was there any objection made to the counting of these votes for Rhea?

A. Yes, sir; I objected, and told them once I would not sign the book.

45. Q. What did you do with these ballots?

A. Well, there were 41 in all that never was counted for anyone.

46. Q. What did you do with these ballots that were marked distinct under the log cabin and indistinct for Rhea and Gorin?

A. Well, there were a good many counted. I could not say how many.

47. Q. Well, when you completed the count what did you do with the ones that were counted?

A. Put them all in the ballot box and locked it up.

Now, here is a deposition of J. M. Hagan on the same point to the same effect:

29. Q. Do you remember the number of ballots that were not counted at all?

A. Yes, sir; 41.

30. Q. Was the cross or mark opposite the names of Rhea and Gorin distinct or indistinct on the 29 referred to?

A. They were very dim. In a great many cases the officers had to get their spectacles in order to see any cross at all.

31. Q. Who first called attention to the marks opposite the names of Rhea and Gorin?

A. Charley Wright.

32. Q. What did he say about them?

A. He called the attention of the other members to those crosses that the ballots were voted for Rhea and Gorin.

33. Q. Did it appear from the marks made opposite the names of Rhea and Gorin that there was any ink on the stencil?

A. Very little; it seemed more like the impression of a dry stencil. I objected to the counting. Mr. Wright said that he would not sign a thing unless they were counted.

34. Q. You remember what the objection was to the 41 ballots that were not counted at all?

A. Yes, sir. They claimed they were disfigured ballots.

Now, then, if the gentleman has any question to ask me.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, this last witness, as I understand you, admits there was some inking, but he says very little?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. He hardly admits that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand there is no controversy over these facts.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, I thought that they had been counted and they did not enter into the contest.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the majority undertake to cast out these 25 votes that were thus marked for the contestee, Rhea, and Gorin?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will read to you about that in due time in the majority report. Now, this man Wright is and was there in Kentucky, and, with reference to these marks on every one of these ballots, neither Mr. Wright nor the counsel for the contestee, that took more depositions than the contestant, offer any explanation of them, but leave it without answer or denial, so that it has been brought pretty close to Mr. Wright, I think. In answer to the gentleman's question, I felt a little different. My views were perhaps a little stronger in reference to counting these and certain other ballots which I will consider in a minute than those of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. And so, if you will look into the report signed by the committee, you will find an alternative report. The record shows that different witnesses do not agree as to the number of these dry stencil ballots; one makes it 33, and others 25 to 41. So we called the number 25 in the report. If you will turn to page 22 of our report it gives the votes in which it states that there may be the same question, and then gives it, deducting the 25 illegally counted for Rhea in the police court district of Warren County, and they are deducted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They are deducted.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. And that number should be added to Mr. Moss's vote. If you do it, the majority for Moss will be 96 instead of 21, if you allow him some others about which I have no question and to which I will soon refer.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Is there not why it makes the majority for Rhea?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, no. There is without any reference to these votes—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. When you leave these 25 votes and have them counted for Rhea, does not it leave Mr. Rhea a majority?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. No, sir. If you do not take these 25 votes from Mr. Rhea and do not count certain votes for Mr. Moss that I think clearly under the law should be counted, if they leave them out and do not count these 25 votes, then Mr. Moss would have a majority of only 21; but if you deduct these 25 votes from Mr. Rhea's column and also add them to Mr. Moss, where they should be, and also add some other votes that I will come to very soon, then the majority of Moss is, and should be, 96, as I believe, instead of 21.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In other words, you are not standing by the report of the committee?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am standing by the report of the committee, for it is an alternative report.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Leaving that aside, I want to ask the gentleman this question: You ask the House to say that these 25 votes shall be taken off from Mr. Rhea upon the idea that this clerk, Wright, with that stencil there in the open room, with a Democratic judge and a Democratic challenger, a Republican judge, a Republican sheriff, and a Republican challenger—five men, ten eyes looking at him—could take that stencil and make those marks on the ballots in the square opposite the names, and you ask us to believe that before we can take the votes?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Well, if the gentleman from Kentucky is done making a speech or an argument in my time, I will answer. The Republican judge was sitting over at a box some way off, handling a registration book. The Republican sheriff was out at the door, as he testifies, 25 feet away, receiving voters and letting them in. The Democratic judge was here, and the clerk was here with a dry stencil handing out the votes. It was as easy as that two and two make four to commit this fraud, and I believe he did it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What was the Republican challenger doing?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not know. I believe he was challenging votes as they came in at the door. He was not watching for this sort of a thing, doubtless did not expect it, and I submit that these peculiar marks on 25 to 41 votes with a dry stencil raises such a strong suspicion of fraud, with the additional proof by the three witnesses that this clerk went in and got a stencil and pulled the rubber out of it, added to the fact that his deposition has not been taken by the contestee to deny or explain or to show that he had acted honestly and fairly—that it makes out the strongest kind of a case for contestant as to these 25 votes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In other words, if a man is charged with crime and fails to testify, you convict him.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, but that is not all. That is only a fair sample of the way this thing was done. "From one know all." Now, while I am at it, I will take up another point in the case. You will notice also in our report that we do not count in our first statement a certain number of votes—that is, we question them—where it was impossible to tell whether the mark under the Republican circle or the Democratic circle or the corresponding marks under the Socialist Labor circle and the Socialist Democratic circle were made first or last. I believe, under the decisions of three States—and I have one here—that every one of those votes should have been counted. You will find in the alternative report that a number of votes of that character we do not count in the first computation. We only counted, in getting a majority of 21, those where we were confident, where you could plainly see, that the mark was broader and better under the device of the Republican or Democratic party; we set aside 7 of Rhea's votes and 32 of Moss's votes because the marks under the Democratic and Republican devices and the Socialist Democratic and Socialist Labor where the blots were were alike.

Now, there was no candidate for Congress on the Socialist Labor or the Socialist Democrats' ticket—I think I get the terms right. The statute of Kentucky expressly declares that where there is more than one candidate voted for for any office that vote shall not be counted. As there was no candidate for Congress in the Socialist Labor or Socialist Democrat column, notwithstanding there may be a mark in those devices as well as in the Republican and Democratic device—although I believe in every instance but one it was done by folding—notwithstanding the mark may be made as distinct in the one case as in the other, yet as there was no candidate for Congress under either device the man has only marked for one candidate and his vote would be counted. I am not aware that that question has ever been decided by the State courts of Kentucky, but in Illinois, under a similar statute, it has been decided.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman has the provision of the Kentucky statute relating to that proposition?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Yes; I have it here.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not ask the gentleman to read it, but I ask him to insert it in his remarks.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Very well. Now, under exactly a similar statute this question came up before the supreme court of the State of Illinois, and here is the decision. I will read from the opinion of the court:

Marking a ballot by a cross will not prevent the vote being counted for a candidate named on one ticket for an office for which no candidate is named on the other

Therefore we claim, and it seems to be right, that he voted for but one man, and that these 32 votes should be counted for Moss and that those 7 should be counted for Rhea.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find upon close examination that there is a difference between the Kentucky statute relating to that matter and the statute of Illinois.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Well, I will read what the Kentucky statute says, if you will wait a moment. I think it states it as I gave it to you.

Now let me hasten along. The supreme court of the State of Kentucky has decided—and I think there is no question about it—that notwithstanding the statute provides for marking the ballots with a stencil and black ink, yet the vote shall not be rejected though marked with a lead pencil, or marked outside the circle, or with a red pencil, or the butt end of a stencil, unless it can be shown that this has been done with some fraudulent purpose. The court construes the statute in reference to marking as directory. It recognizes the distinction, which I think all courts recognize, that statutes which direct the manner in which the right of voting shall be exercised are directory, but all statutes which confer a right, which designates the persons who shall or shall not be legal voters, are mandatory. Such are statutes prescribing the age or sex of voters, etc. All these mandatory statutes must be complied with, while statutes which simply direct how rights shall be exercised are directory. If the voter has placed his ballot in the ballot box, and there has been any neglect on the part of the officers to see that the vote has upon it all things required by the statute, yet if the voter is no party to such neglect his vote shall be counted. I think that is the tenor of the decisions, and I think such a construction of the law is right.

Now, let us look at the facts of this case for a moment. First, we have the blurred ballots. I claim that in these cases, as it is evident that the folding of the vote made the blot and that where the blot appeared there was not the name of any candidate, every one of these votes should be counted.

Mr. THAYER. I understand the gentleman from Maine has gone over this case very carefully—

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have.

Mr. THAYER. And has come to the conclusion that, in fairness and justice, Mr. Moss ought to be regarded as receiving 96 majority.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I would give him that.

Mr. THAYER. That is what the gentleman would give him if he alone were the committee. Now, if the other members of the committee think that Mr. Moss has but 21 majority, who is right?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The other members of the committee were inclined to take, I think, my view of it. There are two tabulated statements—

Mr. THAYER. As a matter of fact—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] yield a moment?

Mr. THAYER. I will, if I am not cut off from finishing my question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say that the assumption that any member of the committee ever conceded that the contestant had only 21 majority is a mistake.

Mr. THAYER. That is the very point I want to reach.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No member of the majority concedes that.

Mr. THAYER. I understand from the remarks of the gentleman now on the floor [Mr. POWERS of Maine] that the committee holds that the majority, properly estimated, is not only 21, but ought to be more than that. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Absolutely correct. Very much more than that.

Mr. THAYER. Then why should you ask the House to predicate its action upon this doubt? I understand that these tickets, some of them, were marked with a lead pencil and were thrown out by the ward or precinct officers. Now, the statute provides that if any voter makes a mark upon his ballot for the purpose of identification his ballot shall be discarded; and therefore the precinct officers discarded those ballots. Now, the majority of this committee come and say that they do not know whether the voter put that mark there or whether the clerk did it; but they assume the clerk did it, because he was the one who found it. Now, it occurs to me that the clerk is the one who is responsible above all other men for finding those marks; and it ought not be considered as any evidence that he put the marks there because he brought those marks to the attention of the others, he being one of four officers whose duty it was to scrutinize those ballots. Under the circumstances, why should not those ballots be thrown out rather than counted as the committee have counted them? And further—

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Is the gentleman through with his speech?

Mr. THAYER. I have not taken but a minute. I have undertaken to ask the gentleman about some things which I would like to have him explain. Now, I want to know how we can be any more correct when we frame such conclusions as those to which the committee has come than the precinct officers in framing their conclusions. Those are the suggestions which I would like to have the gentleman answer.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not know whether I can answer satisfactorily to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I think I can give a satisfactory answer.

In the first place, each one of those ballots where there was a slight mark upon it was counted, and is included in the 21 majority.

Mr. THAYER. But they were not counted by the election officers.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. No, sir; but the supreme court of the State of Kentucky had decided in reference to similar marked ballots that they should be counted.

Mr. THAYER. How do you know but what the voter put those marks there—those two bars in connection with his name—so that, having agreed to vote for one candidate or the other, the persons interested might know whether he had carried out his bargain or not? How do you know the voter did not make those marks with some such intention?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will answer that question right now. I do not believe there is a fair-minded man within the sound of my voice that can look at those tickets and see the peculiarity of the mark, evidently everyone put on with one lead pencil and in but one handwriting on a few Democratic ballots and a large number of Republican, and come to the conclusion that they were put on by any voter or that they could give any indication of what any voter had done. That is how I will answer that, and in a similar case before the supreme court of Kentucky, with ballots having similar marks, the courts have held that it is not enough to show that something of that kind is on the ballot, but there must be other evidence to show it was fraudulently put on before the ballot could be thrown out.

Mr. THAYER. You say the same handwriting. There were simply two little marks, something in a V shape, not at all alike. There is nothing in the mark that would indicate the handwriting of anyone, as I inspected them.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think there is, and on that I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to call attention to the fact that in order to permit these votes to be counted, you have to believe your clerk made these marks in the presence of the other five election officers.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think that question has been answered already. Whether the clerk made it or whether they were sort of catch marks put on the ballots before they were sent out, or where they were made, it does not matter; I know this, that under the decision of your supreme court in Kentucky they should have been counted, and that should settle it.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that decision good law?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. It is the law of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. Is the committee following that decision?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think they are.

Mr. WHEELER. If the committee follows that decision why should it not also follow the decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky in other respects?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think they do.

Mr. WHEELER. The remarks of the gentleman's colleague on the committee—

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] settled that question pretty thoroughly.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I say I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] settled that question pretty thoroughly, and I do not care about taking what little time I have to go over it again.

Mr. WHEELER. I was just trying to induce the gentleman to reconcile his statement with the statement of the gentleman from Iowa. I, of course, do not desire to go into it myself.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Now, what is the truth, what is right, what is just? I have only one or two observations more. I want to say one thing about these ballots and the manner in which they were returned. Let us look at it candidly; let us understand it. Some of our friends on the other side have tried to create a great furor that we are going into the grave of a man who has been placed there by an assassin; that we are attacking Goebel in commenting on the Goebel law. I have not heard one word derogatory of Mr. Goebel from any members on this side of the Chamber. The gentleman is simply creating his man of straw and then knocking him down. We say nothing for or against him; we simply state the provisions of the law and let that speak for itself, whether it be for or against. I say under this law enacted by a Democratic legislature a Democratic board sitting at Frankfort, I believe, appoints in every county in Kentucky a Democratic election board—at least a majority of it is Democratic—and the county board appoint election officers in every precinct. They have the entire election machinery under their control. This law provides for furnishing one blank, and that blank they fill out and return. Gentlemen claim that other returns for which no blank is furnished must be made or we can have the votes returned in the linen bag counted for want of proper and sufficient identification.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Are you referring to the present law or to what was known as the Goebel law?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The law that existed at the time this election was held. That blank was used by the election officers. It also provides that all questioned ballots or questioned and not counted ballots—questioned and rejected I think are the words used—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. "Questioned or rejected?"

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Questioned or rejected, yes; shall be sealed up in a separate linen bag, and it then states certain formalities that shall be observed, all of which I believe to be directory, and then that this bag with the ballots shall be delivered by the precinct sheriff to the county clerk. That the ballots counted as valid shall be placed in a certain box, and that ballots not used shall be destroyed by the precinct officers. This whole machinery, from first to last, is under the control and the supervision of the party of the contestee. They send a return and these ballots, which are a part of the record, to the county clerk. We take the deposition of the clerk showing how these ballots came into his possession and have been in his custody ever since; yet they say there is no sufficient identification and no proof that these were not counted—some of them. Let me say in reply to that, in the first place, that an examination of those questioned and rejected ballots will show that every ballot rejected there and returned in the several linen bags was rejected as a whole, and on account of a mark that went to it as a whole and not as to some particular person on that ballot.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, because I am sure he wants to do what is right.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want the gentleman to demonstrate to me, with some judicial certainty, that these ballots were all rejected in these precincts that are in controversy.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. That is what I am going to do.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to hear the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I say, in the first place, an examination of every ballot there that we have treated as not counted will show that the reason for which it was rejected applies to the whole ballot, and not to some particular name on that ballot.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, you are assuming that it was rejected in that statement.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Hold on. That is the first proposition. I say next that in the whole proceeding, in all the taking of the testimony, not one single Democratic election officer from any precinct was called to testify that one of those ballots had been counted. That is the negative testimony upon the subject.

Mr. WHEELER. You could not do that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That could not be done.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. They could have been called to state that they were counted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; you could not introduce testimony of that kind. It would not be competent, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Well, I do not know that, although I used to think I knew a little law.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am willing to do the gentleman the justice to say that he must know it, as good a lawyer as he is.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I confess that I do not know it, and I believe my statement correct. Now, I do not expect to demonstrate this to the satisfaction of the gentleman. But I want to state one thing more. There is a distinction between votes and ballots. When the return shows that so many ballots were counted and so many were rejected, and so many were spoiled and so many were destroyed, and when the number of ballots counted is exactly the same as the number of votes for the two candidates—I hope I make myself plain—to presume that some of the votes in those rejected or not counted have been included in the votes counted for Rhea and Moss, and that some man who had voted, some of the votes that were put among the counted ballots, had scratched out or erased the names of Rhea or Moss, would be to presume, without knowing anything about it, that the number of names erased and the number of names that were counted afterwards from the questioned or rejected ballots were exactly and identically alike in every case, which could not happen and is not even thinkable.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, I think I understand the gentleman's theory and his reasoning on that question.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. So I take those three things. Now, if the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. All right.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I do not want to take much longer time, because I am occupying time that some other gentlemen can use a great deal better.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am greatly interested in the gentleman's speech, and he is talking as I like to hear a man talk on a question.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The gentleman's compliment is very polite, though I fear not deserved. Looking at it from the standpoint that I wanted to do what was right and fair—I may have been prejudiced—

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I believe you wanted to do what was right.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have no doubt myself that the contestant Moss should have had that certificate of election. It is not a matter of any consequence to this House or to the Republican members of this House whether we have one more or one less member here. The gentleman must admit that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is true.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. It is a matter of grave consequence whether or not the man who is entitled to a seat and who should have had the election certificate if the votes had been honestly counted is deprived of that seat by a refusal of the election officers to do their sworn duty.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] seemed to give us some advice that I think we may not exactly comply with. I recollect that he advised us, in short, to own that we are knocked out, and quit; that we have no honest case. He told us that the era of good feeling that is dawning will be injured if we commit this great violence to the State of Kentucky.

Now, I am of those who recognize the fact that the civil war is over, and I am of those who believe that all of its bitterness should be forever entombed in oblivion and forgetfulness. I am glad to see this era of good feeling ushering in the dawn of the twentieth century. Still, if that era of good feeling is dependent upon this House recognizing and legalizing a false and fraudulent return of votes, a refusal to count votes that should be counted, under the law and by every consideration of eternal right and justice, then I think we are paying a pretty high penalty for it. I think the gentleman drew largely upon his imagination in making that statement. I believe that if this Republic is to endure, if constitutional government is to continue and bless millions yet unborn, it is essential that when a ballot has been cast it should be honestly counted. If we would have the people willingly and cheerfully submit to verdict at the polls they must believe that verdict has been honestly obtained.

I recognize and indorse the position taken by the minority as to right of the State to determine who shall and who shall not vote. That right is a State right fully. This is not a question of calling the State of Kentucky to account for its election laws. I think the laws of Kentucky, in allowing persons to vote, those which confer the right of suffrage, barring the fact that they do not grant female suffrage, as is the case in some few States, are as liberal as any laws in any State in the Union, perhaps more liberal than they ought to be. They have not any educational test, no property test, and they have not yet arisen to the sublimity of the idea of having a grandfather clause. They are all right in conferring the same privileges of voting on black and white, poor and rich.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman if in his State they have an educational or tax-paying test?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. We have a slight educational test, but it applies to all, black and white, alike.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand; and does not the gentleman regard it as a pretty good qualification?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I wish to say to the gentleman that I do. I have no objection to an educational qualification or test at any time, in any State or anywhere. Our educational test is very slight in its effect at present. It was adopted some six years ago. I had something to do with the adoption of it. I believe in it; it only applies to persons who had never exercised the right of suffrage before that day.

Mr. KEHOE. A grandfather clause?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. We have no grandfather clause.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It is a kind of grandson clause, is it not? I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two as to the method in reaching his conclusion in reference to the questioned ballots.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have answered a great many questions of the gentleman, and have occupied much more time than I had intended or expected to.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman does not care to answer them, I will not ask them.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will say this to the gentleman. I believe that the Republican party is not only pledged to a sound currency and to the protection of American industries and American manufactures, but it is one of its cardinal principles that there shall be a fair ballot of those entitled to cast a vote, and that the vote when cast shall be honestly counted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I agree with the gentleman in that proposition.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am glad to stand with the gentleman on that proposition and believe an honest count of the votes cast in the Third district of Kentucky gives to the contestant, J. McKenzie Moss, the absolute right to a seat in this House as a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress. I believe that as firmly as I ever believed anything in the world. I had carefully investigated the subject when I signed this report. The report signed is of rather an alternative character and presenting two methods of counting, either of which seats the contestant. I believe that it would be doing violence to the voters and overruling the will of the majority were we not to seat the contestant. I do not believe that technicalities should be allowed to thwart the popular will. In a conversation with a gentleman, a Representative upon the other side, he stated to me, in justification of the grandfather clause, that they had to do something in his State; that to allow the negro vote to rule meant financial ruin and that to continue to count it out was producing moral ruin; therefore they had to do something of this kind. There is perhaps much of truth in this statement. I do not believe the end justifies the means, and I have always been unalterably opposed to carrying elections by fraud, bribery, violence, intimidation, tissue ballots, ballot-box stuffing, and equally so to any attempt to override the will of the voters by false returns, and I believe that whenever an attempt to count out is brought before this Congress it should and will put its seal of condemnation upon it; and I also am confident will adhere to and reaffirm this cardinal principle of Republican faith by granting to the contestant a seat in this House, to which he is both legally and equitably entitled.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I will ask how much time was consumed by the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-seven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, can you tell us how much time remains on both sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has one hundred and sixty-three minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi has one hundred and ninety minutes.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, if I were a playwright, I would not want any better material for a first-class farce than the trial of a contested-election case in this House. The attention of the country ought to be called to this condition of things. It is not the fault of gentlemen upon the other side, and it is not the fault of gentlemen on this side. It is the fault of the system. This case, Mr. Speaker, has been ably and well presented by gentlemen on the committee, both for the contestant and for the contestee, and yet a large majority of this House know nothing whatever about the case, and after all this discussion will be able to qualify as jurors by declaring that they never heard the case discussed.

There has not been a quorum present in this House since this case was taken up. That is not all. That all really results from the fact that no arguments and no presentation of any question of facts that ought to govern this case will probably control a single member of this House, on either side; and therefore they will not be here until the close of this debate, and then they will come in and cast their votes, following the leadership of the committee on their respective sides.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter; we sit here not as a legislative body, but as a court; not as a quasi court, but a court of final and exclusive jurisdiction, involving not merely a right to property; but, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] has just said, the right of a Congressional district to be represented in this House by the man of their choice. The absence of members of this House results from the fact that they come here at the close of the argument and cast their votes in a purely partisan way. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that the committee has tried to be impartial and nonpartisan. I have no doubt but that every gentleman has been perfectly conscientious, but if you will show me a member of Congress that is nonpartisan, I will show you a man with a patch of hair in the palm of his hand. There is no question that comes before this House in which there is more partisanship exercised than in the trial of contested-election cases.

Mr. Speaker, the system ought to be changed. It is true the Constitution of the United States makes this House the judge of the qualifications and election of its own members, and it would not be right to take it away and vest it in some other jurisdiction; but the proceedings in this House could be so regulated by law as to make it less partisan and compel the members of this court, because they are members of a court, to be here when the case is presented. I will say in this connection that my friend the gentleman from Iowa, my colleague on the committee, has some splendid suggestions as to the methods of procedure in this House, so as to insure a nonpartisan result, at least, in a degree, and I hope he will do himself the honor to present those suggestions some time to this House in the shape of proposed legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a case, as has been stated, which involves questions of grave importance. It involves not only the question, as the gentleman from Maine has said, of the right of a district to be represented by the man of their choice, but it involves the right of Kentucky to regulate in its own way its own elections, and to prescribe the manner in which the voters in Kentucky may exercise their right to vote.

Mr. Speaker, the constitutional right of a State to fix the qualifications of its own electors is not disputed, but has just been conceded by the gentleman from Maine. Following that right, a right every State has exercised, the right that States are more jealous of than any other right, is the right to regulate the manner in which elections shall be held, so far as State elections are concerned, absolutely without any interference on the part of Congress, and they have the exclusive right to regulate the manner of holding even Federal elections, subject only to the right of Congress, given by the Constitution, to modify the regulations made by the State.

Mr. Speaker, in the formation of the Constitution the States were very jealous of this right. All but two or three of the States of the Union at the formation of the Constitution of the United States had constitutions of their own in which they regulated the right of suffrage in their respective States. They were not satisfied in framing the Constitution to leave this right to any implication or construction; they were not satisfied to leave it to the general clause of the Constitution which reserves to the States all the rights and powers not expressly delegated by Congress. They in terms expressly reserved to themselves the right to fix the qualifications of their own voters. Not only that, they reserved the right to fix the manner in which the voter should exercise his right and cast his ballot in all elections absolutely, save only in Federal elections, and in Federal elections they have the right to fix the regulations, subject only to any change that may be made by the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the issue in this case is whether the regulations enacted by the legislature of the State of Kentucky and interpreted by the supreme court of Kentucky shall be respected by this House as the Constitution of the United States declares you should do. They have made these regulations, and although competent for Congress to do so, no modifications of those regulations have ever been made by this Congress. My friend from Maine has said that any law regulating the manner of voting is directory. He might as well have asserted that the Constitution of the United States is directory, because the Constitution of the United States says that the legislature shall have the right to fix the times and places and manner of regulating its own elections absolutely in all cases except Federal elections, and that is subject only to such modifications as Congress may prescribe. You might as well get up here and argue—and it is good Republican doctrine—that the Constitution is directory, for they always cut it out and brush it away whenever it obstructs their way.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FOX. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to ask as to which of these terms such a regulation as this comes under. The Constitution says that the States may, in the absence of provision by Congress, fix the time and the place and the manner of holding elections. Now, I assume you claim that this statute of Kentucky, as construed in the case of Anderson v. Likens, has reference to the manner of holding elections, not to the time or place.

Mr. FOX. Well?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, I ask the gentleman this question: After you have regulated the time of the election, and the place of the election, and the manner of the election, and the election being over, how does a law fixing the manner in which the ballots shall be identified in this tribunal come within the provisions of the Federal Constitution to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. FOX. The Federal Constitution refers to the whole machinery of conducting elections in the States. It must follow that Congress can not interfere in such things unless the right of republican government is denied. The provision in regard to the manner of holding elections refers to the whole election system that is laid down by the States, and the issue in this case is whether this Congress is going to respect what the legislature of Kentucky has done.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOX. Yes, sir; in a moment. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk what I would like to have read. Meanwhile I will yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. MANN. While I do not concede that the discussion in this respect is anything but an academic discussion, because it does not affect the case—

Mr. FOX. Then let us come to the case.

Mr. MANN. I will ask my learned friend, in his view of this question, what would be the result in a case like this: Suppose the legislature—

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, my time is very limited, and I must decline to discuss other cases.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman will not answer the question?

Mr. FOX. Not with reference to another case. I will answer a question with reference to the case at bar, as we may call it.

Mr. MANN. My question has reference to your contention in the case "at bar," which of course I do not consider a serious one, though I suppose the gentleman means it in that way.

Mr. FOX. The gentleman knows that my time is very limited. I do not object to a question concerning the merits of this case; but I do not want him to take up my time in discussing something which is outside of the case.

Mr. MANN. I am sure I do not wish to take up the gentleman's time in discussing anything outside of the case.

Mr. FOX. Let the Clerk read what I have sent up. It is the decision of the Committee on Elections of this House in the case of Wright v. Fuller.

The Clerk read as follows:

Having disposed of this preliminary point, the committee proceeded to the examination of the law and testimony involved in this case.

In discharging the last duty the committee considered that although the House of Representatives, by virtue of the fifth section of the first article of the Federal Constitution, are made judges of the election returns and qualifications of its members, yet this power is not plenary, but is subordinate to the second and fourth sections of the same article, the first of these sections providing that the electors of the members shall have the qualifications of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, the fourth section empowering and authorizing the legislature in each State to prescribe the places, times, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, such regulations being subject to alterations made by Congress.

By force of these provisions the House is compelled, when adjudicating in any matter affecting the election returns or qualifications of its members, to make the law of the respective States from which such members may be returned its rule of action.

Mr. FOX. The gentleman from Iowa in his argument invokes the provision of the Constitution making the House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, as giving the House full authority to do what it pleases, and to adopt whatever rules of law it may choose, unfettered by the enactment of the legislature of the State of Kentucky or by the decisions of its supreme court construing those enactments. While my distinguished friend from Illinois, with all his ability and shrewdness as a lawyer, is compelled to acknowledge the correctness of our position as to the rights of the State under the Constitution, and is compelled to acknowledge that the decisions of the supreme court of Kentucky and its laws must be respected here, he undertakes to explain away those decisions.

The gentleman from Iowa, with his usual frankness, recognizing the force of those statutes and those decisions as being against the contestant in this case, boldly says that we can seat the contestant here and decide the case in his favor in defiance of the laws of Kentucky and the decisions of the supreme court. That is the issue here—whether you will do this or not—whether you will defy the laws of Kentucky or respect them. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided in half a dozen cases that where nothing even but the right of property is involved, that tribunal, the highest in the land, is bound by the statutes of the respective States and by the construction which the courts of the States have put upon those statutes.

I have not much respect for precedents so far as Congress is concerned, because this House has decided contested election cases in every way. Frankly, I will state you can find precedents for any conceivable position that any man may take in reference to any contested election case. But the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal of this country, has always recognized the force of a State statute or of the decision of a State court construing such a statute; and in no single instance since the formation of our Government has the Supreme Court of the United States ever trampled upon a State statute or a decision of a supreme court of a State construing such a statute, unless on the ground of unconstitutionality. The Supreme Court of the United States has never ignored such a statute or decision. Yet the doctrine is proclaimed here boldly—and it is the only consistent one in this case—that there is nothing in the law of Kentucky, nothing in the decisions of the supreme court of Kentucky, that we can not arbitrarily defy and trample upon simply because the Constitution of the United States gives us the power to judge of the qualifications and elections of our own members.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The supreme court of Illinois decided, in reference to bank checks, that under the statute of Illinois the law was one way; the supreme court of Indiana, deciding exactly the same question, held that under the statute of Indiana the law was directly opposite. And the question was fairly raised before the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether it would follow the law of Illinois in Illinois and the law of Indiana in Indiana, and the Supreme Court of the United States declined to do that and said that the Supreme Court would not follow one rule of evidence on one side of the State line and another rule of evidence on the other side of the State line, and it laid down the law itself. Will the gentleman explain to us about that?

Mr. FOX. That is not the case as presented here. That is the case that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] undertakes to make out of this, that it is simply a rule of evidence; that we are not bound by any rule of evidence, he says, that the legislature of Kentucky may make in contravention of common law. But it is not a rule of evidence. It is a regulation of the election system in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to make myself plain there?

Mr. FOX. I must decline to be interrupted in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. FOX. I will tell you what I will do. If you will let me proceed with this argument I will submit to any questions after I get through.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not want to interrupt you if it is not satisfactory to you.

Mr. FOX. I do not want to be discourteous, but that would suit me better. That is the position of the gentleman from Iowa, that this is simply a rule of evidence. It is not a question of evidence. It is a peremptory statute requiring certain evidence to be sent up with the returns. That is all. It is a regulation of the election system in Kentucky providing as to how the contested ballots shall reach the canvassing board. Now, let us come to it practically, Mr. Speaker. If gentlemen have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the minority report of this committee before them, I want to call their attention to certain provisions of the Kentucky statute that are involved in this case.

You will find the blank form of general returns in the report on page 35, and you will find it in the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] on page 3379 of the RECORD. That is the blank form of the returns prescribed by the statutes that must accompany the valid ballots not questioned. Now, will the gentleman say that the statute is directory? Will the gentleman say that, although the legislature has provided that a return shall be made by the returning officers to the canvassing board in a form prescribed by statute, that statute is directory? Will you say that the canvassing board could have considered one single one of these ballots if there had been no return in the case at all?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Will the gentleman answer a question there for information?

Mr. FOX. Yes.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. This is a question of identification of certain ballots which it is claimed by one side ought to have been counted and that were not counted. Now, I want to ask whether or not the gentleman thinks that this House has a right to count such ballots, coming to the House without any actual question of their identity, even though some statutory provision intended to fix their identity was not complied with?

Mr. FOX. Well, they must be identified. We must know where they are.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I know, but suppose they are, as a matter of fact, absolutely and unquestionably identified, but that some statutory provision respecting the method of identification was not complied with. Do you think that we have not a right to count ballots thus actually identified?

Mr. FOX. No such question arises in this case. But, proceeding with my argument, no gentleman, even of the committee, will say that that provision of the statute, section 1483, prescribing the general return, is directory, but that it is mandatory; otherwise you would have no ballots to consider, you would not know where they were from, for whom they were cast, or anything of the kind. Now, then, I say there is another return prescribed by the Kentucky statute which is mandatory in its terms, that must accompany the questioned ballot, and if the gentlemen who have the report on their desks look at the concluding clause of section 1482—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman pardon me right there? I do not wish to disturb the gentleman in his argument.

Mr. FOX. I can not make an argument when it is all chopped up in that way. I am not smart enough to do that, I frankly confess.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman is smart enough to make an argument if anybody else can, from personal contact with him, but I appreciate the difficulties he complains of.

Mr. FOX. I want to make my argument in some connected way and, as I said a moment ago, if you will wait until I finish with my argument, I will be glad to yield to any questions. Now under the system in Kentucky, which is declared to be one of the best in this country, conceded to be, and, by the way, I want to say that all this smoke about the Goebel law and the obnoxious provisions of the Goebel law, if there are any, are not involved in this case. These two sections of the statute here are the only sections of the Kentucky statute that are really involved in this case, providing for the returns, and they were in the old law and have been in the Kentucky law for twenty-five years. So that there is nothing in the world in this discussion about the Goebel law excepting a disposition to hide the merits of this case by prejudicing the minds of those who regard the Goebel law as obnoxious.

Mr. Speaker, under this system whenever a ballot was questioned, whenever a ballot was challenged, whenever the right of a voter to cast a vote was challenged, whenever in counting a vote the validity of the ballots was challenged, under the requirements of the law the managers of the election put it in a sealed envelope. All of the questioned ballots were put in a sealed envelope, and they were required to be sent up to the canvassing board with this certificate. Mind you, whenever a ballot is questioned, whether it is counted or not, it must be treated in this way. Sometimes a ballot is challenged and after discussion it is counted. At other times its validity is questioned and it is rejected; but all questioned ballots, whether counted or not, are required to be sent up in a sealed envelope with this certificate accompanying them.

Provided, That if there are any ballots cast and counted or left uncounted, concerning the legality or regularity of which there is any doubt or difference of opinion in the minds of the judges of election, said ballots shall not be destroyed, but sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election for such judicial or other investigation as may be necessary, with a true statement as to whether they have or have not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom.

The supreme court of Kentucky has decided several times that this provision is mandatory. They have decided that questioned ballots unaccompanied by such a "true statement" as is required there can not be counted.

In the case of Anderson v. Likens a Republican contested the seat of a Democrat, and a Democratic court seated the Republican contestant over the protest of the Democratic candidate, after construing this law as mandatory and determining that the questioned ballots in that case could not be counted because they were unaccompanied by any certificate identifying them in any way.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] cites the case of Booe v. Kenner, and relies upon that as modifying the case of Anderson v. Likens. I want to call the attention of the lawyers in this House to the case of Booe against Kenner, and I hope you will read it, if you have any doubt about it, before the vote is taken in this case to-morrow.

That case was decided by the supreme court of Kentucky on a question of jurisdiction simply. It was held that a mandamus proceeding would not lie in that case, and therefore the court did not have jurisdiction. Whatever else it said was mere dictum; but even in the dictum, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] relies on, there is nothing that even in the slightest degree modifies the doctrine laid down in the supreme court in the case of Anderson v. Likens. It does say—and I take to be true the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, who has the original record, that in that case the questioned ballots were not accompanied by the true statement—the supreme court does say in this dictum that on the merits of the ballots the lower court decided the case aright and that the ballots on their merits should have been counted for the party for whom they were counted, and that is all. Looking to the ballots themselves, without any question as to whether they were properly there or not, they were evidently counted in favor of those candidates for whom they were intended to be cast, and on the merits of the ballots they should have been counted as they were counted; but the court never once decided that the true statement was unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not want me to correct him. The opinion of the court said:

In answer to this we will add that we have carefully examined the record and are satisfied that the decision of the county canvassing board in giving Dudley the certificate of election was right.

Mr. FOX. Of course.

Mr. MANN. And that depended upon those ballots, without the statement which you contended was necessary.

Mr. FOX. I hope every lawyer in this House will get that book and read it, or as many of you as can. That is all it does mean, looking to the face of the ballots.

Mr. MANN. It did not refer to the face of the ballots.

Mr. FOX. Without raising any question as to how they got there, that they were properly counted for those for whom they were intended to be cast.

Mr. GILBERT. There was no issue made on that question.

Mr. FOX. There was no issue made, and there is not a lawyer in this House who has knowledge enough to qualify him to be a justice of the peace who would not say, and there is not a court in the land that would not say, that that statement of the court was pure dictum, unnecessary to be said, and that that question was not involved in the case, and the question was not raised by the facts, but looking to the merits of the ballots themselves.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish the gentleman to be incorrect. They went right into the question that was raised by the court of appeals—the identical question. It was argued before them, and they passed upon it in the way that I have read.

Mr. FOX. The question as to whether a true statement was necessary was made in this case. The court does not refer to it. There is no reference in the case before the court. It was a case that was decided on the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. For every possible effect the question was raised.

Mr. FOX. I will leave it to the candor of every lawyer in this House, and I say fearlessly there is not a court on the face of the earth that would be governed or pay the slightest attention to a dictum of that kind when it was not at all necessary to reach the conclusion reached by the court. They do not even refer to the Anderson and Likens case, or the case of Banks against Sargent, following that case, and they stand as law to-day. And on the merits of the case, as was so ably shown by my colleague from Texas on Saturday, considering these ballots as identified, considering them here—which I do not concede, only for the sake of argument—considering these ballots as being practically identified as being questioned ballots, you can not tell to save your life, without this true statement, whether they were counted or rejected.

Now, let me show you. I will take the precinct of Kisters Mill, precinct No. 25, found on page 22 of the majority report. There is a general return, and it is the contention of the gentleman from Illinois that the general return sufficiently identifies these questioned ballots, without any particular statement as to its having been rejected. I say that this return might identify these ballots as having been questioned, but does not identify them as being counted or uncounted. Now, those of you gentlemen who have the report look to page 22.

Number of ballots counted as valid .....	257
Number of ballots questioned or rejected .....	112

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. "Questioned or rejected."

Mr. FOX (continuing):

Number of ballots marked "spoiled".....	3
Whole number of ballots cast.....	369
Number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed.....	64
Total number of ballots in this book.....	436

Then below it shows the vote for Congress that was counted:

FOR CONGRESS.

John S. Rhea received.....	86 votes
J. McKenzie Moss received.....	163 votes

Now, Mr. Speaker, according to that report there were 112 ballots in Kister Mill precinct, No. 25, that were questioned, that were challenged by somebody. There is not one single syllable in the report which shows how many were counted. It does not determine how many were actually rejected. Remember, as I have told you, all the ballots that are questioned, whether counted or not, are sent up in this envelope.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does not show that some were not counted.

Mr. FOX. It does show that some of them may have been counted and some of them may not have been counted; and hence the necessity with these ballots of this certificate, this true statement, identifying these ballots, and stating how many were counted and how many were not counted, and for whom. Now, I think I can make it perfectly plain to this House, to any man in this House, who wants to understand the question, that in the conclusion reached by the majority of this committee a ballot may have been counted twice for Mr. Moss. Now, let us look at it. It takes four items to make up the sum total of the ballots that were sent down there in the book. One item is the number of ballots counted as valid, another item is the questioned or rejected ballots, of which there were 112, another item is the number of ballots marked spoiled, the other item is the number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed, making a total of 436.

Now, that shows the votes for Congress—that John S. Rhea received 86 votes, James McKenzie Moss 163 votes. How do you know, as this was a general election, at which there were a great many candidates, from governor down to constable; how do you know that some of these votes counted for J. McKenzie Moss were not questioned and still counted? I call your attention to the fact that the whole number of ballots cast at this box was 369. There were 112 votes questioned. The whole number for Congress was 249. There were 10 votes cast for somebody that did not express any choice for Congressman at all. There were that many voters at that box that did not vote for anybody for Congress.

Mr. BURGESS. That is, conceding the whole 112 were rejected?

Mr. FOX. That is, conceding the whole 112 votes were rejected. There were 10 votes not cast for anybody for Congress. That is evidenced by a mere glance at these figures. Now, then, suppose there were 10 others of the questioned ballots that were not voted for anybody except Mr. Moss and were counted. It is perfectly evident that this return would be the same, would it not? There were 10 who did not vote for Congressman at all. There were 10 votes cast that did not express any choice for Congress.

Mr. BURGESS. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FOX. Yes.

Mr. BURGESS. I want to suppose a case under the gentleman's idea, and it is this: Suppose 10 of these ballots counted as ballots did not vote for Moss or Rhea; suppose there were 10 more who voted for Moss that were counted. Would not the return be precisely the same, and by adding those 10 you would count 10 votes twice for Moss if you follow the majority report?

Mr. FOX. That is exactly what I say. If 10 ballots were cast for Moss and you do not know whether they were cast or whether they were counted without the true statement; if 10 votes or 10 questioned ballots have been cast for Moss and counted for Moss, in the total the returns would have been precisely like they are, conceding that there were 10 votes not cast for anybody. Suppose there were 10 votes not cast for anybody for Congress and 10 votes among those questioned were cast for Moss. Then, under your pure assumption that all of the 112 ballots were rejected, and you count them all, you have evidently counted 10 votes twice for Moss.

Mr. LACEY. Where does the gentleman get the basis for his statement that there were 10 votes not cast for anybody?

Mr. FOX. It is an illustration I am making. No man on the face of the earth, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, can tell, without the true statement required by statute, whether the votes were ever counted or not. They are only identified by the returns as questioned ballots; not identified as rejected ballots.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am afraid the gentleman from Mississippi does not appreciate or understand the question of the gentleman from Iowa. The question of the gentleman from Iowa is, Where do you get the 10 votes that were not cast for a candidate for Congress? The returns show it absolutely, because they show that there were 10 votes more cast.

Mr. LACEY. There were 104 votes short, and that would only make 8.

Mr. FOX. There were 369 votes cast.

Mr. LACEY. Three hundred and sixty-three.

Mr. FOX. Three hundred and sixty-nine votes cast.

Mr. LACEY. There were 3 votes spoiled, and that leaves 366.

Mr. FOX. Well, my illustration holds good.

Mr. LACEY. I thought the gentleman was speaking of facts shown in the record outside of this report.

Mr. FOX. Now, Mr. Speaker, that's all there is in this case. It is utterly impossible to identify these ballots in any other way than by the true statement required by the statute. I know there are 112 ballots that are questioned at this precinct, but we do not know that there were 112 rejected, and they are not identified in the record even as questioned ballots. There is nothing in the record to identify them.

You ask where the ballots are that are questioned. Gentlemen show you a lot of ballots dumped into the record without any statement accompanying them showing they were rejected. It is said that in a number of precincts here these ballots were sent up in sealed envelopes without a single mark on the envelopes to identify them in any way as having been questioned. And when any lawyer seeks evidence—seeks from the record competent evidence—to determine how many ballots were rejected, he will fail to find anything in the record whatever identifying these ballots. Why, some of them are not even marked as exhibits by the commissioner himself.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOX. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Do you have any doubt that the ballots were actually cast in the election?

Mr. FOX. I know nothing on the face of the earth about it. I will say this to the gentleman: That Mr. Rhea comes here with a certificate of election and there is no charge of fraud here whatever, and to overcome the prima facie case that he has under the law by virtue of his certificate you must make the proof that certain ballots were illegally rejected and ought to have been counted for Mr. Moss.

Mr. PALMER. What is the gentleman's idea of the reason why the election officers rejected these ballots?

Mr. FOX. I do not know whether they were rejected or not. If you sit down, as a lawyer, to find out whether they were rejected or not, to save your life you can not ascertain.

Mr. PALMER. That is because, you say, the election officers did not put the certificate on the back of the ballots that went to the county clerk to distinguish them?

Mr. FOX. They did not put anything on the back to identify them.

Mr. PALMER. What reason does the gentleman suppose the election officers had for returning the ballots to the clerk's office if they were either questioned or rejected ballots?

Mr. FOX. I do not know what the reason was; but I will say to the gentleman that, as shown here to-day, the majority of those election officers were Republicans.

Mr. PALMER. I do not suppose that makes much difference. What we are trying to do, or what I am trying to do as one of the jurors in this case, is to find out what is the truth; and it seems to me reasonably clear that these ballots were used in that election, and when these election officers returned them to the office of the clerk they returned them either as questioned or as rejected ballots.

Mr. FOX. They ought to have done so; the law required that they should do so.

Mr. PALMER. What earthly reason had they for returning them if they were not in one or the other class?

Mr. FOX. I can not tell.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They might have had as their reason that they were trying to unseat the contestee.

Mr. BURGESS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] allow me to make a suggestion? Assuming that these 112 ballots were in fact returned by the election officers, and that the returns showed that those 112 ballots were either questioned or rejected, can the gentleman tell me how many were questioned, and does he not admit that when a ballot is returned as questioned it means that it has been counted, for otherwise it would be a rejected ballot?

Now, then, the return speaks of ballots "questioned or rejected." It does not say how many or which they were, or whether they were counted, or for whom. Now, how can the gentleman say they were not counted for Mr. Moss and that the committee in counting them now are not counting them twice for Mr. Moss?

Mr. PALMER. I do not find that any of these ballots were voted for Mr. Rhea. I find they were all voted for Mr. Moss.

Mr. BURGESS. May they not have been counted for Mr. Moss? May they not have been "questioned" ballots alone?

Mr. FOX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is mistaken in the assumption he makes.

Mr. BURGESS. I ask how does the gentleman from Pennsylvania reach the conclusion that all these ballots were rejected ballots when the return says "questioned or rejected;" and how can he tell how many were questioned? A questioned ballot would have been counted; that is the point exactly.

Mr. PALMER. There were so many ballots returned as having been cast, and so many as either "questioned or rejected."

Mr. BURGESS. The ballots returned as counted included only the ballots that were neither rejected nor questioned.

Mr. PALMER. I understand—

Mr. BURGESS. So that those returned as "questioned or rejected" may have been all "questioned," and may have all been counted for Mr. Moss; there is no proof to the contrary. Yet in the face of a return of that kind you ask to have those ballots counted again, and added to the vote of Mr. Moss.

Mr. FOX. Now, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I wish to say that he is mistaken in assuming that all the "questioned" votes were cast for Mr. Moss. Many were cast for Mr. Rhea. That is the contention of the counsel for the contestant; but it is impossible to tell from any return that has been made for whom they were cast. You can, of course, look at the face of the ballot and determine, so far as that evidence goes, whether it was cast for Mr. Rhea or Mr. Moss.

But where did that ballot come from?

What kind of a ballot is it? Is it a "questioned" ballot? If so, where is the evidence, the record, that points to it as a "questioned" ballot? I say to the gentleman in all good faith there is nothing whatever in the record to point to these ballots as having ever been even handled at the election—nothing whatever. There is only one case—the case of the Electric Light precinct—in which that fact appeared. In that case there is a memorandum on the sealed envelope saying that none of these ballots were counted. But in no other instance is there any sort of evidence in the record showing where the ballots came from, whether they were questioned or not, and if so, whether they were counted or not, and, if counted, for whom they were counted.

Now, then, coming to another question, I say, waiving everything that I have said as to the law of Kentucky—waiving any arguments that I have made as to whether this House is bound by the statutes of Kentucky—waiving the right of the State of Kentucky, under the Constitution, to regulate the manner of holding its elections—I say, coming to the ballots themselves, looking at the face of the ballots, conceding their validity, conceding their identification, there are more than 21 of these ballots which the committee counts for J. McKenzie Moss but in regard to which no man in this House can tell for whom they were cast. There are no three men in this House who can come up to my desk and, looking at some of these ballots which were rejected, tell me for whom they were intended to be cast.

Now, I invite an inspection of these ballots by any gentleman, and I would be glad to have it done. Look at that ballot on page 1331, and if there are any two men in this House that will agree as to whether that ballot ought to be counted without knowing for whom it is cast, then you have got better eyes than I. Under their system you see there is a blanket ballot, arranged in parallel columns.

There are one, two, three, four, five, six tickets here, and they are all arranged together in parallel columns, six different parties, each having a device at the head of it to distinguish the party ticket from the others. It is a law common to many States. Now, then, under the system in Kentucky the voter takes a stencil when he goes into the booth and stamps in the circle at the head of the ticket the ticket of his choice. He does not have to make any mark on it. A stamp in that circle there is a vote for every man on this ticket, if he does not make any of the exceptions—

Mr. PALMER. You mean on the column?

Mr. FOX. Yes. Now, then, we do not disagree as to the facts, except on the points that I am contending for now. It is stated by counsel for contestant, it is conceded by myself and my colleagues constituting the minority of this committee, that these ballots, as a rule, were blotted in folding. You see that when you fold this ballot down in that way, these two circles coincide, and there is no doubt of that; I concede that; but in folding the ballot it makes the impression in another circle, do you not see?

Mr. LACEY. Ought not that to be thrown out?

Mr. FOX. I thank you for the question. It ought to be thrown out if you can not tell for whom the voter intended the vote. It ought to be counted if you can ascertain honestly and fairly and beyond a doubt—that is, free from any reasonable doubt—which ballot he intended to cast.

Mr. LACEY. Which is the original and which is the impression received from the original.

Mr. FOX. Yes; that is the point I make. Let me make another point here. Mr. Rhea comes here with a certificate of election. These contested ballots come up from precincts controlled by Republican managers of election.

Mr. LESSLER. You invited us here to examine the ballot.

Mr. FOX. Do not break into my argument and I will show it to you. These ballots under the certificates of election give Mr. Rhea a prima facie case. They were rejected by Republican officers of election and ought to be rejected here in a case that is not free from doubt, and I will leave it to the gentleman from Iowa, who himself has been a distinguished member of the Committee on Elections, if I have not stated the correct principle of law. I leave it to any honest man in this House—

Mr. LACEY. The difficulty about this particular ballot would not be the question of a distinguishing mark. It is merely inability to identify the intention of the voter.

Mr. FOX. Yes.

Mr. LESSLER. Have you a provision in your law that it was the duty of the election officers to come as near as they can to ascertaining that?

Mr. FOX. I concede that to be the law.

Mr. LESSLER. I asked you that.

Mr. FOX. I concede that to be the law of this case here now.

Mr. LESSLER. Is not the question as to that ballot, if in a man's common judgment that is not the reverse?

Mr. FOX. Well, which is the reverse?

Mr. LESSLER. I would say this one.

Mr. FOX. You would say it because you have seen the Republican ticket there underneath it.

Mr. LESSLER. You are making an assumption and you ask a question of some sort—

Mr. FOX. I do not doubt your sincerity, sir, but I say there is not a man in this House that is free from that political bias.

Mr. LESSLER. If you come and ask me a question and you do not allow me to give you a reason, then there is no reason for bringing us over here. The only point as to that particular ballot was that the impression there is stronger than the impression here.

Mr. FOX. You think so? The Republican managers of election did not think so. It is just exactly what I said, that no two men will agree about it, and you and the gentleman from Mississippi do not agree.

Mr. LESSLER. I never saw one of these before, and did not know what they were when you asked the question.

Mr. FOX. Now, just to show you how men may differ, let me show you something here. Here is the contention of the counsel for Mr. J. McKenzie Moss with reference to West Door precinct, No. 9.

Listen to this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has now consumed one hour.

Mr. FOX. I thank the Speaker for the information.

On page 22 of the contestant's brief, which makes the statement with reference to West Door precinct, No. 9, you will find that there were 119 votes not counted. He states that there were 119 votes rejected at that precinct. Now listen. Counsel for contestant in this brief states:

Some were rejected because they were blurred and blotted by folding before the ink was dry. It is difficult in some of them to ascertain the voters' intention on account of these blots, but the marks are plain enough on 23 ballots to show that the voters marked them as for the entire Republican ticket.

They only contend that 26 of the rejected ballots from West Door precinct, No. 9, should have been counted for Mr. Moss. Yet the majority of this committee count 53 of those rejected ballots for Mr. Moss, when it was never contended by counsel for the contestant that more than 26 ought to be counted. They concede the fact that the others are so doubtful that it is impossible to determine the intention of the voter.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Without counting the 56, how would the case stand?

Mr. FOX. That would elect Mr. Rhea of itself.

Mr. LESSLER. In all of these tickets which are marked and countermarked—in other words, where there are two marks—they are all in the same places relatively, the same two columns, are they not?

Mr. FOX. Not all of them.

Mr. LESSLER. They are always in the Republican and Socialist Labor columns.

Mr. FOX. Some of them are in the Democratic.

Mr. LESSLER. The principle I want to get at is this: In determining the class of ballots where the relative marks are the same in both columns there are 26 of those that you have agreed should be counted in the Republican column.

Mr. FOX. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have this conversation loud enough so that it can be heard across the aisle.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. LESSLER. Is it not safe to infer from the ballots that you consider to be without any doubt as to the intention of the voter that those which are in doubt, but where the marks appear in the same columns, belong to the same class, and that the 53 votes are rightfully counted for the ticket having the heavier impression, which is the Republican ticket?

Mr. FOX. Why, I will say to my friend that, in my judgment, the proper way would be to inspect the face of each ballot. If you determine in the first place that these are identified as the questioned or rejected ballots, then it was the duty of this committee, and would be the duty of this House, so far as possible, to inspect them. If you determine that they are sufficiently identified, it would be your duty to inspect each ballot, and if you can ascertain from an inspection of the face of that ballot the honest intention of the voter as to which one of these tickets he intended to vote for, then it ought to be counted in that way; but if it is impossible to tell which is the original impression and which impression was made by folding the ballot, then for whom can you count it?

Mr. LESSLER. In a scrutiny of these ballots, is there any doubt in your mind, taking them as a class, knowing the relative positions of the first and second impression, that those ballots were cast for J. McKenzie Moss?

Mr. FOX. Why, certainly, I do not believe a word of it. I do not believe anything that the testimony does not show. As a juror in this case, or, if you please, as a judge, it is my sworn duty not to arrive at any conclusion that is not sustained by proper and competent evidence. That is all I say. No man anxious to arrive at the truth, whether he be a lawyer or not, is going to assume a fact that is not proven by the record, and no lawyer will ever state a thing to be a fact that is not proven by competent evidence.

Hence I say that if ballots like this, and there are a great many of them, if you can not say whether the stamp was made there [indicating], and this blur is made by folding, or whether the stamp was made here [indicating], and this is the blur that is here [indicating], then you can not count the ballot, because you do not know the intention of the voter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do you know whether this ballot [indicating] was counted or not?

Mr. FOX. I know it was counted for Mr. Moss; and I say—and, gentlemen, do not take my word for it, because the rest of the ballots are here—I say there are over 21, which is the majority that they give to Mr. Moss, and which they counted for Mr. Moss, just as uncertain as that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Was it counted by the election officers?

Mr. FOX. It was not counted for anybody by the Republican managers of the election. The returns were signed, and they are all agreed about that.

Mr. LESSLER. Have you such a provision in the law as we have in the State of New York, that the vote of the man who voted this ballot [indicating] may be rejected for all the candidates on the two tickets for the reason that you can not determine for whom he voted? But here he voted for J. McKenzie Moss for Congress, and nobody else.

Mr. FOX. That is a good argument.

Mr. LESSLER. Is there anything in your law by which you would reject everything on that ticket or count a portion of it where a man cast his vote for one name on that ticket and for no other man? Say, for instance, that it was for Congressman, or whatever these other things are, would you throw it out for all when it shows on its face that he voted for Moss?

Mr. FOX. Your argument is a perfectly sound one, but your premises are just as far wrong as they can possibly be. You assume that the voter marked this ticket [indicating]. There is nothing to show that. It is a mere assumption. I say, if he marked this ticket [indicating] and intended to vote this ticket, and this blur [indicating] is a mere blur made by folding, then he intended to vote for nobody for Congress, and it ought not to be counted for anybody. Now, let me illustrate. Gentlemen who are entirely conscientious arrive at the truth very differently in this proposition. My colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and myself were appointed a subcommittee to examine these questioned ballots. He made up a typewritten report—I have it here—showing his conclusions as to which of these ballots ought to be counted and which ought not to be counted. As to the uncertainty, he said that there were some of them so absolutely uncertain that they ought not to be counted for anybody. In his report, dictated by him to his stenographer, he states that there were certain votes that ought not to be counted for anybody, because it was impossible to tell which was the original impression and which was the blot made by the folding.

The gentleman from Maine has brought in a totally different count, and he contends that these votes should be counted for Moss, and he insists on them being counted, while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with all of his nonpartisanship, states here that it is impossible to count them for anybody. Now, you see how gentlemen will differ. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who makes the majority report in this case, makes the majority for Moss 21 votes, after counting all the ballots that he is in doubt about. The other gentleman, the gentleman from Maine, would include in those votes for Moss a number of rejected ballots which the gentleman from Illinois says are so uncertain that they ought not to be counted for anybody.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And yet the gentleman from Illinois includes fifty-odd votes for the contestant where he only claims 29.

Mr. FOX. They count 53 votes for Moss from precinct 9, when the contestant never contended for but 26 of those votes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not concluded my argument, but I have consumed all the time that I desire to take from the contestee in this case, and I yield the balance of the time allotted to the minority to the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FOX. It is not understood, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kentucky is to speak now. I simply yield the balance of my time to him to dispose of as he pleases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not concluded my argument, but I have consumed all the time that I desire to take from the contestee in this case, and I yield the balance of the time allotted to the minority to the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi states that the remainder of the time on that side is reserved to the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOREING].

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state in the beginning of my remarks that I have neither the right nor the inclination to cast any reflections whatever upon the sitting member. Our relations have always been friendly and pleasant. Nor does the record justify me in saying anything derogatory of the integrity or honor of the contestee.

This was an election, Mr. Speaker, held for the election of electors for President and Vice-President, for governor of Kentucky, and members of the Fifty-seventh Congress of the United States. It must be remembered that this election was held under the Goebel election law when it was clothed with its fullest power to do evil. That law was enacted in contempt of the rights of the citizens and the liberties of the people. It has been interpreted to afford the greatest opportunity for fraud upon a free and equal ballot. It has been administered to crush the public will by turning out the duly elected officers of the State of Kentucky and installing in their stead the defeated Democratic candidates.

Under the operation of the Goebel election law the election machinery of the State is an adjunct to the political organization. The central board, composed of three State commissioners, are a partisan political body elected by the legislature, which itself is elected under the most unjust apportionment law that ever disgraced the statute books of any one of the forty-five great Commonwealths of the Federal Union, an apportionment that disfranchises one-half the Republican voters of Kentucky. According to the showing of the Democratic board in Kentucky Mr. Beckham carried the election for governor by 3,500 majority; but out of 100 members of the State legislature the Republicans have 26 and the Democrats 74. How do you figure this? It is by making the Republican districts twice, and in some instances three times, as large as Democratic districts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from this partisan State board emanates all power in Kentucky to hold elections, make returns thereof, to canvass and tabulate the votes, and try and dispose of contested-election cases, except the legislature itself is the board of trial of contested cases for governor and lieutenant-governor. The power goes out from the State commissioners through the county commissioners, to the officers in the precincts, who are clothed with the authority and charged with the duty of holding elections. These creatures of the parent board hold the elections and report back, through the county commissioners, to their masters.

The State commissioners have the right at any time to remove the county commissioners and appoint others in their stead. The county commissioners have the right at any time to remove the election officers in the precinct and appoint others in their stead, and it has been the practice under the Goebel law, on the day before election, for the county commissioners to make such changes as have been demanded by the Democratic organization. In the district of my colleague [Mr. INWIN], in the election of 1899, I believe, on the night before the election they changed nearly 100 of the election officers.

Mr. IRWIN. They changed 87.

Mr. BOREING. Eighty-seven. And in like manner they removed the election officers in other counties. Mr. Speaker, the record in this case discloses the fact that the same practice was continued in 1900. Now, neither the State commissioners nor the county commissioners are required to give any bond for the faithful performance of their duties. There is no provision in the Goebel election law to punish either a State commissioner or a county commissioner for a violation of law. I do not care whether they are all three Democrats or whether they are two Democrats and one Republican; they are in the majority in the State and in the county boards; and it is not true, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] stated to-day, that one of these commissioners has always been a Republican. In my own county, where we have 1,000 Republican majority, they gave us two Democrats and one Populist for county commissioners.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking of the election law as it existed at the time this election was held. It is not the same now. In the beginning of the campaign of 1900 the Democrats in Kentucky found themselves in a defenseless position before the people. They had in broad, open daylight held up and robbed the Republicans of their election for State officers after the State board had canvassed the returns, tabulated the vote, and given them their certificates of election.

The same board that canvassed the vote and declared the result, after having tabulated the vote and declared the result on the face of the returns, transformed themselves into a board of contest, in which capacity they exercised the judicial power granted to them by the Goebel election law, and threw out the vote of county after county, including the city of Louisville, disfranchising one-fourth of the voters of the State, until they disposed of the Republican majority. So intense was the public sentiment against the Goebel law that even the Goebel Democrats, and especially the class of Democrats that went with the Goebel organization, because it seemed to be regular, would not approve of the methods practiced under its provisions. So monstrous was this conduct that it grated upon the sensibilities of the Goebel Democrats themselves.

I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that a Kentuckian by instinct is an honest man, whether he is a Republican or a Democrat. Kentuckians will not stand for office stealing by any party. They have something of the spirit of the Revolutionary fathers who believed that it was better to die than to live without civil liberty. So, notwithstanding my distinguished colleague from the First district of Kentucky in the Fifty-sixth Congress stood upon this floor and prophesied that the Goebel election law would stand forever as a monument to the memory of its framer, yet in less than six months perhaps after that utterance the legislature was convened in Kentucky for the purpose of repealing or modifying the Goebel election law.

Mr. WHEELER. He will find a more fitting monument in his calumniators and slanderers, who are denouncing his memory after his death.

Mr. BOREING. That prophecy is, perhaps, like your former prophecy. A Democrat is the worst prophet upon earth, because he always fixes the time for the fulfillment of his prophecy so near that he lives to witness the failure of his own predictions. [Laughter.]

Now, the legislature assembled in August and adjourned till October, and then they took down the most objectionable features of the Goebel election law; but they did not let that apply to the ensuing election. When the Goebel election law was enacted in Kentucky we had just had an election, and it was about eight months before another would occur. Yet the legislature put into operation what is known down there as "the emergency clause." We do not have any "grandfather clause" in our constitution; but we have a very peculiar and a very convenient clause known as the "emergency clause."

So, when the legislature of Kentucky enacted this law, notwithstanding it was eight months till an election, they applied "the emergency clause," and why? To enable the existing legislature to appoint the State commissioners. But when they assembled to take down this law, notwithstanding it was less than thirty days before an election, they failed to apply "the emergency clause."

Now, I put it to my colleagues and gentlemen on the other side of this House to answer this question: If the Democratic party—the Democratic organization in Kentucky—did not mean to use the Goebel law in the election of November, 1900, why did you not apply the "emergency clause" and let it go into effect then? Why, Mr. Speaker, this legislature passed two bills. They passed one in reference to the ballot and one in reference to the election machinery; and to the act passed in reference to the ballot they did apply the "emergency clause," letting that act go into effect at once, because the change in the ballot would tend to confuse the illiterate voter, especially the colored voter, and afford a pretext for throwing out his vote. But they wanted to use the election machinery in one more election—they therefore reserved the right to make one more "steal," and promised the people of Kentucky that they would be more honest thereafter.

This action was accepted by the Republicans at the time as notice that the Democrats intended to make it appear on the face of the returns, if possible, that they had a majority. By their action with reference to the election of 1899, in taking these offices from the Republicans by contest, they put themselves in a very bad attitude before the people of Kentucky and the people of the country; so the Democratic organization adopted a different policy for the campaign of 1900, a plan of a multiplicity of acts of petit larceny, instead of one act of grand larceny, which they had perpetrated before.

There are enough outcroppings in this record to show these facts. I do not mean to say that we did not have a fair election in any precinct in Kentucky in 1900, but I do declare to this House and to the country that wherever we had a fair election in Kentucky it was attributable to the fact that the election officers were better than the law under which they acted. I further declare that in the Third district, where this contest is made, the fact is disclosed by the record that they had some officers of election that were as bad as the law.

I refer especially to Hazelips Mills precinct, in which one Charley Jenkins figured, the district where they laid the Republican ballots in one pile and the Democratic ballots in another, and then this sweet-scented geranium, Jenkins, says, "Let us see whether all these ballots are signed by the clerk of the election." He looks at the Democratic pile and he finds only one. "Well," said some Republican, "that is a mistake; let us count it."

"Oh, no; I do not believe we ought to count it. Let us look at the Republican pile."

And they find 21 there that this Democratic clerk had failed to sign. Some Republican said, "Well, that is a pretty slick trick." Jenkins got angry, threatened to cut to pieces the man who impugned any dishonesty to his motives. Now, if Jenkins was sincere in his anger, then he had made a mistake and that vote ought to have been counted. If he had method in his madness, then he had committed a corrupt act and still the ballots ought to have been counted. I do not want to go into this legal discussion, as lawyers will never agree as to what the law is, and I speak as a layman, but allow me to say this: There is nothing better settled in Kentucky than the doctrine that neither the ignorance nor the fraud of election officers can deprive a citizen of his right to vote and have his vote counted as it is cast.

There is another doctrine well settled there, that it is the duty of an election officer to count the vote of every voter the way it has been cast if the intention of the voter can be determined from the ballot. Acting upon these two lines of doctrine, a majority of your committee have reached the finding that if we count these votes according to this doctrine it elects McKenzie Moss and does not elect John Rhea, the sitting member; consequently, they have not considered it necessary to go into the investigation of all the frauds that have been alleged and proven in this record.

There is another instance of an election officer who is as bad as the law in the person of Charles Wright. I believe that is in the Police Court precinct. What do we find? I am not quite as full of concession as the distinguished gentleman from Chicago. He admits that no fraud is proven there. Well, it is a fact that no witness testifies that he saw Charles Wright put those marks on the margin of those ballots, but to my mind, Mr. Speaker, there is the strongest kind of circumstantial proof that he did do it. It is in proof in this record that the Republican sheriff was engaged at the end of a long hall receiving the voters.

It is in proof in this record that the Republican judge was given a registration book, and he was poring over that with his spectacles on, trying so see that everything conformed to it; and here is Charlie Wright, with a lead pencil in one hand and a stencil in the other, getting in his work. Why, it is like the old man's coon trap down in North Carolina. He caught them comin' and gwine. It is in proof that he was the custodian of the ballots, that he gave out these ballots to the voters, that he had an opportunity to commit this fraud, and that he was the only man who did have an opportunity to put those marks upon the ballots. It is in proof that he was the first to discover them. It is remarkable that the very man who is suspected of making these marks discovers them first. Just like the clerk in the other precinct when he failed to sign the ballots, he was the first to investigate it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOREING. Can I have a few moments more?

Mr. MANN. How much longer time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BOREING. Not over ten minutes, and maybe five.

Mr. MANN. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, there is method in all this; there is design in all this. They always made their marks to affect a few Democratic votes as well as Republican votes. You know that in order to make a lie go you have to put a little truth in it.

Now, it always worked out to the detriment of the Republicans and to the advantage of the Democrats; but it shows and tends to show just what we have always believed in Kentucky, that if we had been given a perfectly fair vote and a fair count in all the precincts that Mr. Yerkes would have been elected governor and Mr. Beckham would not have been elected governor. But I have no time to go further into this line of discussion. It has been said on the other side that Mr. Moss is a pretended Republican. I regret that such flings as that should come from the other side, because it is always in bad taste for a party or a church to abuse a man after he has left it. It is sufficient to say that McKenzie Moss has repudiated your doctrine, condemned your methods, and walked from under your jurisdiction, and it is too late now for you to undertake to arraign him and try him for political heresy, and however unsatisfactory his politics may be to the party that he went out from, they are eminently satisfactory to the party with whom he has cast his fortune and with whom he will affiliate in the future.

But I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that he came not alone when he walked out from under the dominion of Goebelism in Kentucky. Along with him came a large per cent of the best talent, the best culture, and the best standing of the Democratic party. Along with him came most of the former leaders of the Democratic party. Along with him came 75 per cent of the old Confederate soldiers in Kentucky, who refused to stand for the Goebel law or the Goebel methods in elections. All these men have not joined the Republican party, but they did all join in condemning Goebelism.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have only to count the vote as the voter intended to cast it in order to seat the contestant in this case. The majority of the committee have been exceedingly fair in reaching their conclusion, in my opinion, and the law of the case has been fully and ably presented by the distinguished attorneys who have spoken for the majority report. I deem it unnecessary to attempt further to discuss the facts, and I have the utmost confidence in the jury that is to try this case. Whether the lawyers will all agree about the law or not I do not know; but I am confident of one thing—that the jury will be able to find a verdict from the facts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX] will consume some of his time at present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURKETT). Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to use some time now?

Mr. FOX. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he desires to use any more of his time?

Mr. MANN. Not at present.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for the contestee [Mr. Rhea of Kentucky] to conclude his remarks to-day. I have already yielded the entire time remaining to the minority, two hours, to the gentleman from Kentucky. It would be unpleasant and inconvenient to him to make a part of his argument this afternoon and a part to-morrow. In view of this fact, I hope that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I stated to the gentleman from Mississippi this morning that this very complication would arise unless the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee, should address the House at the time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX] commenced.

I think the House has exercised great patience in extending the time for the debate in the case. At my request this morning the House consented to give the extension of one hour on a side, which was purely for the purpose of accommodating the gentleman from Kentucky as to time, and it hardly seems to me a fair thing to the House to make the request which the gentleman from Mississippi now prefers.

We have acted in the very best of faith toward the gentlemen, in endeavoring to accommodate them so that all the members of the minority of the committee might have opportunity to be heard, and so that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Rhea] might have the very unusual time of two hours in which to discuss the case. I think the gentleman from Kentucky might well proceed. The House is pretty well filled now, and will undoubtedly become much better filled as soon as the gentleman commences his speech. I myself am not willing that the House adjourn now. I think it is only fair to the House that the gentleman proceed.

Mr. FOX. We are not complaining of any treatment of the House. The action of the House has been satisfactory, as to time and all that. It would be a great convenience to the contestee and, it seems to me, a favor that might very well be granted. I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of this argument be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom of the House ever since I have been here to close up an election case within two days. As a matter of accommodation to the minority, we originally planned that the vote should be taken upon to-morrow, so that more time might be devoted to debate, and then have allowed a portion of to-morrow in addition for debate, and because the business of the House is already delayed and we have not the right to ask further time in this case I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the contestee has two hours and five minutes and the contestant one hour and eighteen minutes of time remaining.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed. Of course I understand that he fears that breaking into his argument will make a difference; but I think the gentleman from Kentucky enjoys an opportunity which he might well seek—of having the House fresh to-morrow when he closes his argument.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it has been my hope and purpose in addressing this House touching a matter which not so much personally concerns myself as it does the great State of Kentucky that I should be able to present reasons, not invective, to the jury which is to decide my fate, and that I might be indulged the poor privilege of having at least a respectable number of the jury present to hear me; but when one is caught between Scylla and Charybdis he must do the best he can.

It would be a sad day for the American people if election contests were to be decided from purely partisan standpoints. It would be untrue if I were to say that I did not believe a Democrat could get a fair hearing at the hands of an Election Committee whose majority is opposed to him in politics, or a fair hearing in the House where the majority is against him.

It would also be a great mistake to assume that neither the Elections Committee nor the House could make a mistake in its findings. It was never my purpose to assail the committee or accuse the House of having been influenced in its determination of this case by political bias. Therefore I regret that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois in opening this debate deemed it necessary to assure the House that the committee was not controlled by partisan bias. I am reminded, however, that authority venerated among men hoary with age and entitled to as much acceptance as an election-contest speech in the House has said that "the wicked flee when no man pursueth."

The question to be determined here, and the question I am ready to meet, is whether, under the statute laws of Kentucky, controlling its elections, the right of each and every legal voter who presented himself at his polling place to cast one vote and have it counted as he casts it was violated in an election which on its face gave me the certificate to hold the seat which up to this moment I am entitled to. If by fraud, injustice, or partisanship I believed I was returned to this House I would scorn to hold the place here. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I am not reduced to the personal extremity that a mere salary of about $400 a month would induce me to hold on with tenacity to a place to which I was not elected. I have the pride which ought to animate every man that holds a place on this floor. That pride would go down in humiliation and defeat if I had the knowledge that a majority of the electors did not send me here.

I regret—I say it sincerely—I regret that my colleague from Kentucky, Judge BOREING, has played the part he did in this contest. I shall not say anything unkind of him or about him. I shall not even deal in kind against his political associates in the State of Kentucky. I shall not be taken from the true issue involved here, to answer the purely bitter partisan arraignment of my political associates in Kentucky, further than to say that his speech disclosed the fact that he is both partisan and ignorant of the election law in Kentucky. I took his language, and he said this:

That the Republican party was held up and the Republicans robbed of the State offices in 1899 after they had won them and the State board of election commissioners had issued to them the certificates, and that that was done under and pursuant to the provisions of the Goebel election law.

For more than a hundred years, indeed since that great Commonwealth which he and myself both represent adopted its first constitution, the law in regard to a contest and its settlement for the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor has given to the general assembly final and exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I can not, and I will not.

Mr. BOREING. I thought you would not.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Yes; you are right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Had William Goebel never been born on this earth; had he never left that other great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to seek his fortune in Kentucky; had he never trod its clover-blossomed fields; had Kentucky sunshine never bathed his pale brow; had he never drawn inspiration from the eyes of her fair women, the law invoked and the law which settled that contest would have been the same.

Just for a brief while I shall endeavor, not to defend, because it needs no defense, but to explain to those who do not know the changes that were made in the election laws of Kentucky as they existed from time immemorial, by the law known as the Goebel election law. There is not in any Commonwealth in this glorious Union a nonpartisan election board—not one but what the majority party in that Commonwealth enact all its laws, the election laws included, and not one to which commits the conduct and control of its elections to its political opponents who are in the minority.

Now, under the old law, as I said, from the inception, from the adoption of the first constitution in Kentucky, where contests ever arose over the governor or the lieutenant-governor, it was committed to the general assembly. It was not in any wise changed by the Goebel election law. Now, the law from time immemorial in contests for State offices less than governor and lieutenant-governor, the canvassing board, the contest board, was composed of the governor, the attorney-general, the auditor, the secretary of state, and the treasurer of the State. It has never occurred in the history of Kentucky that the State offices in Kentucky have been divided between two political parties, so that necessarily whichever party won at the election the election machinery was, in that sense, purely partisan, and the politics of those charged with the administration of the law and the settling of the contest rendered them more or less partisan in their judgment and decision.

In the selection of officers to conduct the election on election day under the late law, the county judge, one man in each county, was charged with the sole duty of selecting all the election officers, judge, sheriff, and clerk. In that selection he was only restricted by the statute which said he should make an equal division between the two dominant political parties, or the two political parties that cast the highest vote at the last general election in the Commonwealth; that is, one judge should be a Republican and one a Democrat, and a like division existed between the offices of sheriff and clerk; and that notwithstanding the fact that pretty nearly—I may say, in 99 out of 100 cases the county judge who made the selection was a candidate for reelection at the time himself, thereby selecting those who were to pass upon his own case in the coming election.

The canvassing board under the old law was the county judge, the county clerk, the county sheriff, all three of whom were frequently, as is known to every Kentucky member on this floor, candidates for reelection. The law said that when you come to canvass the vote as to county judges, the county judge shall stand aside and the clerk and sheriff shall render the return and write the certificate; and when you come to the county clerk's office, the clerk shall stand aside and the judge and the sheriff shall render the result; and when you come to the sheriff, the sheriff shall stand aside and the judge and the clerk shall ascertain and declare the result. But if men would forget their duty and proceed along partisan lines purely, how easy would it be for a common understanding between the three for the judge to say to the clerk and the sheriff, "You count me in and I will count you in;" and so all along the line.

Now, the change made by the Goebel law was that instead of the governor, etc., constituting the canvassing board for the State and the board for the contest of offices less than the governor and lieutenant-governor, there was selected by the general assembly three State commissioners who did this. The change in the county machinery was that instead of the county judge appointing the officers and the county judge and sheriff and clerk constituting a canvassing board to issue certificates, the State commissioners named three commissioners for the county, who did this work.

I can not undertake to say what the court in London, Laurel County, Ky., did, but I do undertake to assert, upon my word as a member of this House, that in no election occurring in the Third Congressional district of Kentucky has that county board been composed of all Democrats, but that two of them were Democrats and one a Republican, and that the records will show that a Republican was appointed upon the recommendation of the local Republican committee of each county.

If, in the judgment of that State board, it found it necessary to keep a Republican off in the county of my colleague [Mr. BORENG], I am not responsible, nor are the voters of my Congressional district. But the Goebel election law did not remove, or attempt to remove, one safeguard thrown around the ballot box by the State law. It still commanded that the election officers should be equally divided between the two political parties. It still gave to each political party not only a division of the election officers, but it gave each party the right to have an inspector and a challenger named by the Republican organization of each county who could be present at the polls and in the polling places from the time the first vote was deposited until the certificate was written. If in any county in the Third Congressional district that was not done, this record fails to disclose it, and it could only have been because the Republican organization failed to name and appoint such person to be present at the polling places.

Now, none of us—none of you any more than myself—are free from political bias. Determine how we will to divest ourselves of all political feeling in forming our judgments and writing our verdicts, we can not do it. It creeps in unconsciously oftentimes and displays itself in the ardor of debate. Now, my genial and able friend, Judge SMITH of Iowa, on Saturday—and I submit to himself and that side of the Chamber—forgot that he was a judge in his argument and became a Republican advocate. I admire his genius, his ability, and his kindly good nature, but his political bias just exuded out of the pores of his skin, and he could not help it. [Laughter.]

When he was being interrogated on the floor touching the returns from the county of Warren and asked why it was that the Republican officials at these polling places did not make the returns that our contention is the Kentucky statute and the Kentucky courts say must be made in order to give validity to the so-called contested ballot, he said in distinct language that under the operations of the Goebel law we had all the sheriffs; that the law was so written as to put the appointment in the power of Democratic hands, and that the Democratic commissioners used the law, as he says, so that at every polling place the Democrats had the sheriff, who was the arbiter in dispute, and the Republicans had the clerk, who could do nothing but write the ballot. That is his exact language as printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman read the language from the RECORD, if that is the exact language?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I hate to take the time, but I know what I am talking about.

Here it is:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the question. It would not do a particle of good, because you say the law of Kentucky required them to be certified to by all the election officers, and you had the controlling factors of the board; you had one judge and the sheriff in each precinct.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I submit that that is not either in substance or in letter the language as the gentleman stated it.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I do not hear the gentleman's remark.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I submit that the language just read is not either literally or in substance the language as before stated by the gentleman.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. That is a mere quibble. You were discussing (and I was referring to it) the returns from the sixth election precinct in the city of Bowling Green, where these contested and so-called uncounted ballots were sent up. The very question and the answer (if I had the time to go into the matter) would show—all the colloquy led up to it—that the statement was made on our side that if it was an intentional fraud that this return was withheld it was within the power of the Republican election officers there to sign the return and have the Democrats refuse; and you gave that answer to that statement, in which you say at that time we had the sheriff.

Now, I undertake to say that at four of the polling places whence come these disputed and contested ballots you had the controlling factor, and your own evidence discloses it. In Electric Light precinct, No. 20, you had J. H. Thompson, a Republican sheriff; at Police Court Room, 21, you had F. N. Downer, a Republican sheriff; at Gas House, 22, you had W. H. Hawkins, a Republican sheriff; and at precinct 18 you had T. C. Garretson, a Republican sheriff. At only one precinct where any considerable number of ballots appear in this record as contested or rejected had the Democrats the control of the election machinery; and under the election law of Kentucky controlling that election, which has been the law since Kentucky was a State, if a difference arises between the judges as to the right of a voter to vote or as to the legality of a ballot which is voted and taken out of the box, the sheriff of the election has the controlling vote in that disagreement.

I understand it is admitted that unless all the ballots are accounted for that were at the polling place on election day no certain conclusion can be arrived at as to these contested ballots. Now, let us see what your report shows. Here is the report of the majority; let us test it by that rule. I repeat it is conceded by the majority of the committee that every ballot that was in the box at any polling place where a contest arose on the morning when the election was opened must be accounted for in the return, or else you can not arrive at a true conclusion as to what was or what was not done with the contested ballots. Now, let us take the Electric Light precinct:

Number of ballots counted as valid	264
Number of ballots questioned or rejected	100
Number of ballots marked "spoiled"	10

The ballots counted as valid, with those questioned or rejected and those marked "spoiled," make the total number 374.

Number of ballots not used, and destroyed after the polls closed, none.
Total of ballots in this book, 418.

Now, tell me what became of the difference between 374 ballots counted and 418 ballots that appeared at that polling place on election day. You can not do it, but perhaps I can.

The evidence of John E. Dubose, witness and attorney—not to be feared much as a lawyer, but most dangerous as a witness [laughter]—the evidence of John E. Dubose taken in this contest—the man who appeared before your committee to argue the contestant's case—discloses the fact, on cross-examination, that he and the contestant who sits there had these ballots in their possession.

The law says that the ballots shall be kept sealed and inviolate; surrendered to no man except a court of jurisdiction competent to try the contest. Yet this man is forced to admit, because he knew we knew it—he is forced to admit on cross-examination that he and the contestant went into the clerk's office, the clerk being a partisan of the contestant, as well as the custodian of the ballots, and that he and the contestant were there permitted to handle these ballots. That explains the difference between 374, the number accounted for, and 418, the number in the books.

Now, I maintain, under the concession of gentlemen who agree with the contestant side of this case, that if all these ballots are not accounted for, then no conclusion can be arrived at touching these questioned or rejected ballots. I ask gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, then, what they will do with the Electric Light precinct in the face of this discrepancy of 26 and 18—44 ballots. Gone where? I don't know. Never in the possession of anybody but the clerk, who was the contestant's supporter and partisan, and the contestant and his lawyers. What will you do with that when the committee that reports sixty odd votes of the 100 returned "contested" ought to be counted for the contestant in order to give him the 21 majority that they say he is entitled to?

Now, I want to take up a little of the law of this case and notice for a while some of the law relied on by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Judge SMITH. His contention is that the House is not bound by the statutes of a State touching the conduct of its elections; is not bound by the law as laid down by its highest courts of adjudication construing those statutes, and for that he cites from McCrary on Elections, a most learned law-giver, who has written, perhaps, the best treatise in the English language, as was said by Judge SMITH, on the subject of elections. This is the law Judge SMITH cites to uphold his contention:

"That it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of elections, upon good and sufficient evidence that fraud has been perpetrated, or unlawful or wrongful means resorted to to prevent electors from freely and fearlessly casting their ballots, to reject such illegal or fraudulent votes cast at any such polling place, which rejection so made as aforesaid shall be final unless appeal is taken within ten days to the probate courts."

He cites further from the report of the committee of the House, of which Judge McCrary was perhaps a member at that time. Touching upon this Alabama case, the committee in its report says:

In the opinion of the committee, it is not competent for the legislature of a State to declare what shall or shall not be considered by the House of Representatives as evidence to show the actual votes cast in any district for a member of Congress, much less to declare that the decision of a board of county canvassers, rejecting a given vote, shall estop the House from further inquiry. The fact, therefore, that no appeal was taken from the decision of the board of canvassers rejecting the vote of Girard precinct can not preclude the House from going behind the returns and considering the effect of the evidence presented. From this evidence we conclude that box No. 1 was improperly rejected by the board.

What does that decide? It simply says, which everybody knows to be true, that no power rests in the legislature of the State of Kentucky or the State of Alabama to say: If you do not do a certain thing by a certain day you can not wage a contest before the Congress of the United States touching the seat of a member therein; if you do not appeal to some court by a certain day your right of appeal to the Congress will be denied. Certainly nobody was ever so foolish as to contend that the House would be bound by any such statute as that, because the Congress of the United States has lodged in it exclusive and final jurisdiction of all contests arising over the right of a member to his seat on the floor of the House; and no State legislature could enact a law requiring that an appeal should be taken from the canvassing board to some court of the Commonwealth or of the county before the right of appeal would lie to the Congress of the United States on a contest. So it proves nothing.

Now, what has the Kentucky court and the Kentucky statute said? It does not say, you must do this, that, or the other, else you can not carry the record to the Congress of the United States. It simply says that in order to validate a return, in order to give authenticity to a return, in order to constitute a return, that certain prerequisites must be complied with. In other words, that if a ballot is contested and either counted or rejected, and it is to be made the basis of a contest before the canvassing board or before Congress, that in order to identify that ballot before the canvassing board of the county, you must keep it separate and apart from all other ballots returned.

You must inclose it in a sealed envelope, you must seal that envelope with sealing wax and put the county election seal upon it, and you must indorse across the face of that seal your names as election officers; and a true statement must accompany these ballots showing how many there are, whether counted in whole or in part, and if counted in part, for whom and how many. Now, I want the gentleman from Illinois who will conclude this case to tell me how a canvassing board, a committee of Congress, or the House itself can determine that a ballot has been contested and either counted or not counted unless something is done to or concerning that ballot to identify it when it gets before the county canvassing board or before the committee of this House or the House itself.

Will it do to say that the general return, as has been argued here, which is written in the back of the poll book, which states how many votes were cast for the Democratic electors for President and Vice-President, naming them by name; how many for the Republicans, naming them by name; how many for Yerkes, the Republican candidate for governor; how many for Beckham, the Democratic candidate; how many for Mr. Moss, and how many for me and for the other candidates for those offices, merely saying that there were 100 contested ballots? Can anybody determine from that? I ask any member of this House, can you take such a return as that and simply because you find in a sack sent up with the other returns a lot of ballots without any other mark of identification or any other certification from those in charge of the election, and either count in whole or in part, or reject in whole or in part, and send them up for future investigation in the absence of any mark made by these gentlemen identifying them—can this House undertake to say what those ballots are or what was or what was not done with or concerning them? I do not think it can be done.

But it is said that if the contention of the contestee here is the correct one, then a fair election and an honest return could be forever prevented by the dominant party in control of the polls in Kentucky. Let us see about that, Mr. Speaker. Let us apply it to the case in hand.

All the contested ballots come from the county of Warren, and 95 per cent of them from the precincts within the city of Bowling Green. No complaint is made that any injustice was done in the selection of election officers at either one of these precincts. No suggestion of fraud is intimated in the record or notice of contest or the brief of attorneys except as to the action of possibly three men, but none is intimated against the manner of their appointment or against the intelligence or loyalty of those representing the Republican party.

Now, if it had been the purpose of the Democratic officials to refuse to execute the law, in order that they might beget an untrue and an unrighteous result, then those Republicans had it absolutely in their power to have made the fraud so apparent to this House that you would not have found this contestee here asking you to consider his case. How? They could have made the return required by the statute. They could have said to the remaining Democratic officials, "Here is the law. Write this return and indorse your name on this official envelope, containing these ballots," and if those Democrats had refused to do it it would not have been necessary to seek the extraordinary processes of a court of chancery or the writ of mandamus. The fraud would have been so apparent that every honest man in Bowling Green and Warren County would have risen in rebellion, and the mere presentation of such a record as that would have been conclusive as to what was the purpose of those Democrats who refused to obey the law. But how do our friends, the enemy, seek to avoid that? Oh, they say that Charlie Wright, up in the Police Court-House precinct, said, "Damn it, if you do not count these votes and put them in here and sign the returns, I will not sign anything."

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] went ahead to read a statement from Mr. Downer, in which Mr. Downer said that he had never served as an election officer before. I will add my personal word about Mr. Downer. He is one of the most intelligent, upright, courageous men I know; a man of large business interests; not a street vagabond, not an election bummer picked up by a Democratic election commission who would serve their purpose either by reason of ignorance or cowardice, but a most reputable man; and had the contestant dared make use of the privilege I tried to get him to exercise—to be heard in his own behalf—I would have forced him to admit that my personal tribute to Frank Downer is a true one. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the answer, though, that somebody said, "Oh, if you do not do this, I will not do the other." Well, if they had not done the other there could not have been any return at all, and if the Democrats had refused for that reason, especially, because the Republicans refused to coincide with them upon the legality of some vote or the illegality of another, the statement of Frank Downer would have been conclusive of the fraud. It is the merest pettyfogging to make such an argument to this House. It is a special plea that is not worthy of a police-court lawyer. It is insulting to the intelligence of the American Congress to say that Republicans like Frank Downer and Erasmus Motley and others who presided over and protected the Republican interests at the polls submitted to this thing either through fear or coercion, and wrote anything or refrained from writing anything that Charlie Jenkins or Charlie Wright or some others suggested to them.

The committee pays me the personal compliment—for which I return my gratitude and thanks—to say that it finds nothing in the record that affects my character as a man or a member of this House. I say to the committee that I thank them for that personal estimate; but I should be untrue to myself, knowing these Democrats as I do and knowing this record as I know it, to let the charge of fraud and corruption and forfeiture of their oaths be hurled at them, and escape through a fulsome compliment of this committee. I accept the fate of my political brethren in Kentucky and my district. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am no better than my party or its humblest honest voter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They stand for honesty and for purity as much as I do, and if by this record they are to be impeached, then I will share a common fate with them.

When the committee gets into my own county of Logan, where the fiercest onslaught was made in the notice of contest, in the argument of contestant's attorneys and in the attempted evidence, it finds that gross frauds were perpetrated. Inasmuch as a brother of mine was a Democratic elections commissioner, it may fairly be assumed I am responsible for certain things. I want to say now that he did all he did at my suggestion. He did nothing I would not have done, and he did nothing any honest man ought to refuse to do for his party. The committee says that it finds that the grossest fraud was perpetrated in precinct No. 20, in Logan County, Ferguson precinct, and it prints the returns to show that everything went wrong down there. Here is the report:

This charge of conspiracy to commit fraud relates to a number of precincts in Logan County. It is quite certain that the Kentucky law requiring an equal division of the precinct election officers between opposing political parties was neither properly nor honestly obeyed by the county election board in Logan County. It is also quite certain that in a number of the precincts the conduct of the officers of election is subject to criticism. For instance, in Ferguson precinct the Democratic clerk of election conducted himself in a particularly reprehensible manner. It is charged that in this precinct a number of persons who voted the Republican ticket made out the proper affidavits in accordance with the statute after being challenged, but that nevertheless their ballots were not counted, and that the officers of the election conducted the election without regard to the law and wholly in the interest of the contestee and against the interest of the contestant.

The certificate of return by the election officers in this precinct of itself at least casts suspicion on, if it does not condemn the action of, the election officials in the precinct.

They made the following return:

Number of ballots counted as valid.....	245
Number of ballots questioned or rejected .....
Number of ballots marked "spoiled" .....
Whole number of ballots cast.....	21
Number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed.....	96
Total number of ballots in this book.....	360

The evidence discloses the fact that in a large Democratic precinct a Democratic clerk, with the very able assistance of a Republican inspector, Bill Darby, whom I have known all my life, imbibed too much whisky and got drunk and conducted himself improperly; and the evidence discloses that other Democratic officials at that polling place and Democrats on the outside tried to get him to vacate his place and let some one else go in and conduct the election. But he was simply in a drunken condition, and to say my political friend and my personal friend, in an attempt to perpetrate fraud, being a man of enough intelligence to fill the place of clerk, would intentionally make such a return as that, to be seen of all men, is so preposterous on its face that it is idle for anybody to talk about it.

I admit that the return is in such a shape that no credence could or ought to have been given to it. I admit that by reason of his drunken condition such things occurred there as would at least throw a suspicion of fraud—not actual, but legal, technical fraud—around about it and to render the return wholly uncertain; to make it impossible for either the canvassing board, perhaps, or the board of this House to determine what was the true result at that polling place. I recognized that fact and introduced proof to show the true vote. Recognizing that the value of the returns had been destroyed, I put on the stand or accounted for 144 voters, who testified under oath that they were there present on that day, legal voters, and cast their votes for me.

I accounted for all but 9 of the votes claimed for me in that precinct. "McCrary on Elections" says you may destroy the returns, utterly blot them out, but every legal voter has the right to establish the fact that he voted that day, and he get credit for it. But I told you Dubose is more dangerous as a witness than as a lawyer. Dubose did not know that, having destroyed the validity of the returns, if it was thrown out it would also throw out the 85 votes for his man. I proved within nine votes of all that were claimed for me, but he never put on the witness stand a single voter to prove a vote for Moss, and the committee do not disturb this return, because if the committee threw out the whole return it would knock out Moss's 85 votes and away would go the majority of 21 which they give him. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is now 5 o'clock, and I would ask the indulgence of the House to quit now, to enable me to conclude to-morrow. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I hope that may be accorded to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

- H. R. 6018. An act granting a pension to Lue Emma McJunkin;

Mr. NELSON. I present a memorial of the legislature of Minnesota relative to the bill (S. 3575) to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Introduced by Mr. Young. A memorial to the Congress of the United States, by the legislature of the State of Minnesota, relating to the bill (S. 3575) to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, introduced in the Senate by Senator KNUTE NELSON on February 5, 1902.

Whereas the power and right to "regulate commerce among the several States" given by the Constitution to the Congress has by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court been held to include the right to fix reasonable maximum rates for common carriers engaged in the transportation of such commerce; and

Whereas the Congress attempted to delegate its power in this regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and attempted to give said Commission the necessary authority for that purpose; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has recently decided that the act creating the said Interstate Commerce Commission is seriously defective and incomplete, and that while said act confers on said Commission the power to declare existing rates unreasonable it does not give said Commission the power to prescribe a tariff of reasonable rates to replace those found to be unreasonable; and

Whereas since said decision there is no tribunal having the power to correct any unreasonable rates or classifications of freights in the domain of interstate commerce; and

Whereas one of the most important functions of the Government is thus suspended, and immediate legislation is imperatively necessary to clothe said Interstate Commerce Commission with adequate power to regulate interstate commerce and to prescribe reasonable maximum rates for the transportation thereof, and the State of Minnesota, as well as the entire Northwest, is vitally interested in the enactment of such a law; and

Whereas the bill S. 3575, introduced February 5, 1902, in the Senate of the United States by Senator KNUTE NELSON, contains all of the provisions necessary to invest said Interstate Commerce Commission with the powers needed for the purposes aforesaid, and said bill is therefore one of the most important bills now before Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved by the legislature of the State of Minnesota, That we heartily indorse said bill S. 3575 and respectfully urge the early passage of the same by the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That we indorse and approve the action of Senator NELSON in introducing and advocating said bill.

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the Secretary of State, to each member of Congress from Minnesota, and to the President of the Senate of the United States.

CLAIMS AGAINST COLOMBIA.

Mr. HOAR. The President sent in the other day papers regarding claims growing out of the Colon fire. They were quite voluminous. The resolution of the Senate asking for them was passed on May 15, 1900, and it has taken the Department a good while. It was suggested when the papers came in that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations without printing—at any rate, until they could be examined. I am now informed that they relate to claims amounting to several million dollars—claims which had been in the State Department in Mr. Bayard's time, and for the examination of which a commission had been agreed upon between the two Governments, but something interrupted the negotiation, and then the city of Colon was seized. There will undoubtedly be a very serious application to Congress for relief, and there will also be a demand for a hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it is very important that the papers should be printed. I move that they be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Has the Senator ascertained what the cost of the printing will be?

Mr. HOAR. I have not. I do not understand, when a document sent in by the President is to be printed for the use of the Senate, that the first printing requires the application of the rule as to cost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the papers referred to, which are now in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations, be printed as a document.

Mr. HOAR. If it shall turn out that the cost of the printing is beyond the amount allowed by law, and that the law applies in such a case—which I do not think it does—we shall be so informed; and then, if it be necessary, we can pass a joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the papers referred to by him be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Tallman shall continue only at the rate of $12 per month from and after the death of said helpless son.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 21st instant, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11011) granting an increase of pension to Emily J. Tallman, have examined the same and report:

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, hereto appended, is adopted and the passage of the bill is recommended.

The House report is as follows:

"The soldier named in this bill, who served as private in Company B, Eighteenth New Hampshire Infantry, from September 7, 1864, to June 10, 1865, when honorably discharged, was a pensioner under the general law at $16 per month from September 16, 1887, on account of catarrh and disease of lungs, following measles of accepted service origin.

"He died March 30, 1890, of disease of lungs.

"The beneficiary named in the bill, now 62 years of age, who married the soldier October 25, 1860, was pensioned in February, 1890, as the widow of the soldier under the general law at $12 per month, commencing from the date of the soldier's death, and she is now in receipt of said pension, and in her application for pension stated that the soldier left no children under 16 years of age surviving him at the time of his death.

"There has been filed with your committee the affidavit of the beneficiary, showing that she has a son, William C. Tallman, born July 21, 1863, who was nearly 21 years of age when his father died; that he was a cripple from birth and had epileptic fits ever since he was 3 years and 4 months of age; that the fits have so impaired his mind that he is wholly incapacitated, mentally and physically, to earn his support, and that he has no means of support and no money, but is wholly dependent upon the affiant for support and care; that she is 62 years of age and unable financially to bear the whole burden of his support, and unable physically to take care of him in case of sickness.

"Other testimony filed with your committee shows that said William C. Tallman is the son of the soldier; that the beneficiary is destitute; that he has no means of support, and that he has been a cripple and epileptic, and, in fact, an incurable imbecile, unable to take care of himself since arriving at the age of 3 years and 4 months, and medical testimony filed with your committee corroborates these statements as to the son's mental and physical condition.

"Following precedents established in former Congresses, to add to the pension of a soldier's widow an additional sum of $12 per month for the support and maintenance of a blind, idiotic, insane, or helpless child, your committee recommend a like increase in this case, and the bill is reported back with the recommendation that it pass."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that concludes the Pension Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Now let us go back to the Calendar and take that up for the rest of the morning hour.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 493) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia." It is the bill that I called up yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is No. 1 on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. That is an important bill. While it is somewhat long it will always be in our way until it is disposed of. If the Senator thinks it will not give rise to debate and is likely to have quick passage, I will not ask the Senate to delay action upon it.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I do not think it will give rise to any debate.

Mr. HALE. It is undoubtedly an important bill, and it ought to be passed. We may as well take it up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall receive first consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the committee was, in section 1, on page 1, line 7, after the word "by," to strike out the words:

Striking out in the first and seventeenth lines thereof the word "ten" and inserting in lieu thereof in each of said lines the word "eight." Also by.

So as to read:

Amend section 3 by adding at the end of said section the words: "No justice of the peace during his term of office shall engage in the practice of the law, subject to the penalty of removal from his office."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 15, after the words "Amend section 42 by," to strike out "inserting in the second line thereof, after the word 'present,' the word 'constituted,'" and insert:

Substituting for said section the following:

"SEC. 42. CONSTITUTION.—There shall continue to be a police court in the District as at present constituted, consisting of two judges learned in the law, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of six years, or until their successors are appointed, who shall each receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. The said judges shall hold separate sessions and may carry on the business of said court separately and simultaneously, and are empowered to make rules for the apportionment of the business between them, and the act of each of said judges respecting the business of said court shall be deemed and taken to be the acts of said court. Each judge when appointed shall take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 6, to insert:

Amend section 51 by substituting for said section the following:

"SEC. 51. Disability of judge.—In cases of sickness, absence, disability, expiration of the term of service of, or death of either of the judges of said court, any one of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia may designate one of the justices of the peace to discharge the duties of said police judge until such disability be removed or vacancy filled. The justice so designated shall take the same oath prescribed for the judge of the police court and shall receive the sum of $5 for each day of service, in addition to the salary now provided for by law, to be paid in the same manner as the salary of the judge of the police court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 15, to insert:

Amend section 190 by substituting for said section the following:

"SEC. 190. There shall continue to be a coroner of said District, who shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall receive a salary of $1,800 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 20, to insert:

Amend section 645, line 5, by substituting the words "three thousand five hundred" for the words "two thousand five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 23, after the word "of," to insert and by substituting, in lines 2 and 3, the words "corporation counsel," for the words "city solicitor;" so as to make the clause read:

Amend section 932 by striking out in the tenth line thereof the word "for" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "of," and by substituting, in lines 2 and 3, the words "corporation counsel" for the words "city solicitor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 13, to strike out:

Strike out sections 966 and 967 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 966. CAUSES FOR DIVORCE A VINCULO.—A decree of divorce from the bond of matrimony may be granted in any of the following cases, namely:

"First. Where either party has committed adultery during the marriage, unless the same has been with the consent or connivance of the other party; or, after knowledge of the fact, he or she has continued voluntarily to cohabit with the guilty party.

"Second. Where the party complained of has been an habitual drunkard for the period of three years.

"Third. Where the party complained of has been guilty of cruelty of treatment, endangering the life or health of the other party.

"Fourth. In case of willful desertion and abandonment of the complainant, by the other party, for the full, uninterrupted period of two years.

"SEC. 967. CAUSES FOR DIVORCE A MENSA ET THORO.—A divorce from bed and board may be granted for either of the following causes, namely:

"First. Cruelty of treatment by either party endangering the life or health of the other party.

"Second. Reasonable apprehension by one party of bodily harm from the other."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 5, on page 57.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to lines 3 and 4. The bill strikes out "contracted" and inserts "contracted."

Mr. COCKRELL. In the amendment to section 1286?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To section 1286.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose that is because in the original print here it is "who has knowingly and willfully contracted any marriage." It is spelled wrong in the original, but, unfortunately, both words are spelled right in the bill. The bill ought to read that the word "contracted" be stricken out.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Let "contracted" be substituted for the correct spelling of the word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 14, to insert:

Amend section 1582, in line 6, by striking out all after the word "expressed" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And whether said lots or parcels conform to the general orders of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia made under existing law or under authority of section 1901 of this code; and if upon such examination he shall find the plat correct he shall certify the same under his hand and seal to the said Commissioners with such remarks as appear to him necessary; but no such plat or subdivision shall be admitted to record in the office of the surveyor without an order to that effect, indorsed thereon by said Commissioners."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 5, to insert:

Amend section 1584, line 3, by striking out the words "to the public or subject to the uses declared by the person making such subdivision."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 8, to insert:

Amend section 1589, line 2, by striking out the words "when requested," and in lines 3 and 4, by striking out the words "when the same shall be level with the street or surface of the ground."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 2 on page 62.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that we may complete the reading of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are only two and a half pages left.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Only two and a half pages.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let the reading be finished; and if there is to be no debate on the bill, I will consent to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PRITCHARD. On behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after line 3, insert:

Amend section 553 by striking out, in line 16, "1891," and inserting "1901."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does that appear in this bill? Mr. PRITCHARD. It is to amend the section of the code, page 98.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not in this bill at all.

Mr. PRITCHARD. No, sir; it is not in this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I find in the estimates of appropriations for the present fiscal year, on page 366, a recommendation for a provision in this bill for—

One deputy clerk, to be known as financial clerk, to enable the clerk to carry out that portion of section 58 of the District code, approved March 3, 1901, relative to receiving, accounting for, and disposition of all fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures imposed or taxed by the police court on process ordered by the court.

I find that the police judges recommend the adoption of such an amendment, and I send the amendment to the desk to be read. It proposes to amend section 58 of the code.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 9, insert:

That section 58 of an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 58. FINES TO BE PAID TO THE CLERK OF THE POLICE COURT: All fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures imposed or taxed by the police court shall be paid to the clerk of said court, either with or without process or on process ordered by the court. The clerk of the police court shall, on the first secular day of each week, deposit with the collector of taxes the total amount of all fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures collected by him during the week next preceding the date of such deposit, to be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, subject to the requirements of the provision of the act of June 11, 1896, to meet any deficiency in the police or the firemen's relief fund. The said clerk shall render an itemized statement of each deposit aforesaid upon such forms and in such manner as shall be prescribed by the auditor of the District of Columbia."

Mr. COCKRELL. What has been read is from page 12 of the code of law?

Mr. PRITCHARD. It is on page 12.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not in this bill at all?

Mr. PRITCHARD. It is not in this bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is in the old code.

Mr. PRITCHARD. It is in the old code at page 12.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suppose the proper method would be to have the amendment adopted as an additional section or in lieu of the section covering that subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 6 of the bill, after line 19 and before the next clause amending section 61, let the amendment be inserted amending section 58 of the code.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On page 2 of the proposed amendment, line 9, there is a bracket in pencil. What does the Senator signify by it?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is the new matter which provides for the appointment of the deputy clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not been read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; it has not yet been read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And to carry into effect the provisions of this section there shall be appointed by the judges of the police court an additional deputy clerk, to be designated "financial clerk," at an annual compensation not to exceed $1,800.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where is it to come in?

Mr. PRITCHARD. After line 19.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 19.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let us see how it reads.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 58 as follows:

SEC. 58. Fines to be paid to the clerk of the police court.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, what change does it make in the original? It is only additional.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The change occurs at the end of the proposed section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last five or six lines.

The SECRETARY. "And to carry into effect the provisions of this section"—

Mr. COCKRELL. Then say: "Amend section 58 by adding thereto the following words." It is not worth while to insert the whole section again. That is the way the amendments have been made all the way through.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That will answer the purpose, I think.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 58 by adding thereto the following words:

And to carry into effect the provisions of this section there shall be appointed by the judges of the police court an additional deputy clerk, to be designated "financial clerk," at an annual compensation not to exceed $1,800.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, about the salary. I have here the original section. It does not say what the clerk's salary shall be.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In the estimates of appropriations the salary is fixed at $1,500.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go in at that for the first.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection to making it $1,500.

Mr. COCKRELL. One thousand eight hundred dollars might be too high for a deputy clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13 strike out "eight" and insert "five;" so as to read:

At an annual compensation not to exceed $1,500.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if it is the purpose to pass this statute in its present condition and to leave the code amended in all this vast number of particulars, some of them verbal, relating to different sections, so that everybody who wants to know what the law is has first to look at the code and then to search through the separate sections and patch together the two? It is a very awkward and unscientific method of amending bills that we have got into to say that an act shall be amended by striking out some word and inserting another in the old law instead of reenacting the law; but we do it ordinarily only where there is really a substantial section stricken out and a new text put in, which amounts to the same thing as a new law. It would seem to me that the proper course to pursue would be to refer the bill back to the committee with instructions to report the existing District code with these amendments in it, and to order, when it comes in, that it may be read only by its title, unless the Senate otherwise direct at the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. In a moment. The Senate will, of course, accept the authority of the committee that what we have passed has been incorporated in the code. The only difficulty about it is that in the House, if it goes there as a new bill in that way, it might require the reading in the House of the entire District of Columbia code, which would be a very serious obstacle to its passage, and which I do not want to create; but it seems to me that there ought to be some mode of getting rid of this method of legislating in an important matter. It would be very embarrassing and uncomfortable for all lawyers and citizens, for the courts and everybody else.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, it was in order to obviate the necessity of reading the entire code that the amendments were prepared as now reported. It is the purpose of the committee to have a reprint of the code which will meet the objection my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] makes to the bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Do I understand that the code is to be printed as amended?

Mr. PRITCHARD. That is the intention.

Mr. COCKRELL. But that can only be done after the bill has been agreed to in conference.

Mr. PRITCHARD. That is true.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill go to the other House and let the amendments be acted upon there, and when the bill is agreed to in conference then let the conferees bring in the perfected code just as the Senator says it ought to be, and then we shall have the code as it will be when amended. That is the only way it can be done.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I was about to say I thought would be the only solution of the difficulty, not by doing it in the Senate alone, for it has to go to the other House and be acted upon there. I desire to express the hope when this bill has been adopted, or when the two Houses have agreed on some bill of which this may be the foundation and substance, that the two committees will find some way to substitute the revised code as it will be with these amendments, and it can then be put through very quickly.

I do not know that every Senator present knows that before the Revised Statutes of the United States of 1884 were passed the House spent nearly the whole summer in evening sessions, reading every chapter and going over the bill very carefully. The revision was under the authority of very competent and experienced lawyers of the committee there. Then it came over here, and was read one evening at an evening session by title only. The Senate took it absolutely upon the authority of the House, not a word of it being read here. It was then sent to the Printer, and the volume of the Revised Statutes, printed and bound, was laid on the desk of the President of the Senate the next morning when the Senate met. I dare say the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] remembers that fact.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I was on the committee.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate took it on his authority, without wanting to inquire further about it, and without even wanting to hear him make a speech about it. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEMUEL GROVE.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, by an oversight this morning Order of Business 797, being the bill (S. 2305) granting an increase of pension to Lemuel Grove, was not considered. I ask that it be taken up and passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2305) granting an increase of pension to Lemuel Grove.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "late," to strike out "of" and insert "captain;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lemuel Grove, late captain Company F, Forty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN Y. COREY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 4366) granting a pension to John Y. Corey.

Mr. GALLINGER. A similar bill has passed both Houses of Congress, and I move to reconsider the vote by which it was passed and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon I yielded for the reading of the reports of the majority and of the minority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this bill, which consumed the remainder of the afternoon and enabled me to make a little collection of papers.

This bill is one that is sui generis. There has never been, I believe, since the foundation of this Government a bill with such a proposition in it as is embodied in the bill now pending. Senators on both sides have decided convictions about it. My conviction of it is that it is unconstitutional, unjust, immoral, and dishonest, and I do not mean to flatter anybody by making that statement.

I listened with a great deal of interest, not to say enthusiasm, to the impassioned and thrilling statistics submitted on this question by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] on yesterday, and heard with a great deal of pleasure his glowing eulogy of the cow as the giver of almost every good and perfect gift in this country. I could even add uses of the cow which were not mentioned by the Senator from Vermont. But, nevertheless, my enthusiasm, moved by his oratory, did not quite sweep me from my convictions, and I am still of the same opinion that the bill should not pass.

I endeavored to put in the minority report, so far as I had a hand in drawing it, my reasons for my attitude on this bill, but being conscious of the fact that reports of committees are never read, except when read at the desk, and then never heard, I shall be compelled to repeat something contained in the report.

This proposition is one in line somewhat with all the protective measures that have been adopted by the Congress of the United States. It is a singular fact that only the people who desire the money of other people have been pushing bills of this character. It is not the great mass of the people who rise up and demand protection for a single class, and there has never before been a proposition for such a tax as this. We have had bounty acts passed, in which the whole public were taxed for the benefit of people engaged in an industry that was supposed to labor under some inequalities, such as the cheapness of labor in pauper Europe, and so on, and we have had taxes levied upon all the people of the United States on fish caught in the fisheries of our Northern seas. We have had taxes levied to pay manufacturers in order that they might enjoy the home market and sell their products about 50 or 60 per cent higher in the United States to American citizens than they sell the same articles abroad, where there is the competition of the world.

Any proposition which taxes other people for the benefit of any one industry is, in my opinion, obnoxious not only to the Constitution, but to good morals. But here is a proposition that goes far beyond any other that has been considered here. This is a proposition not simply to tax one man for the benefit of another, but to tax out of existence a legitimate industry in order that another industry may enhance its profits. If the manufacturer of oleomargarine or butterine or imitation butter were called upon to pay a part of his earnings, or if the people who produce the raw material, the cotton-seed oil, beef fat, lard, and other ingredients in butterine or oleomargarine were called upon to pay a part of the tax for the interest of the butter men, that would be bad enough, in good conscience; but this is a demand that an industry shall be absolutely exterminated. I do not believe that any protectionist has ever heretofore gone that far. In fact, I consider this to be protection run mad—gone clean crazy—and how the Senate or any deliberative body can coolly consider a proposition of this sort is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the committee said in his report that—

The principal opponents of the bill are the manufacturers of oleomargarine, live stock associations, and the cotton-seed mill men.

The cotton-seed interests will be but little, if any, affected by the passage of this bill, as more than half of their oil product is exported, and of the portion retained in this country only the best grade of it can be used, and none is used in the manufacture of the best qualities of oleomargarine. Besides, there are other commercial avenues open for the disposition of cotton-seed oil.

We fail to see how the live-stock interest will be seriously affected, as the caul fat from which oleo oil is derived is but a very small percentage of the animal's value, and this material has commercial value for other purposes.

I do not think that that is an exactly correct statement, although I have no doubt the Senator from Vermont thought he was making it exactly as it was. I am not here representing livestock associations, or the cotton-seed-oil men, or the cotton-seed-producing men, or any other interest; but I am here representing that vast body of American citizens who rarely have a voice raised here in their behalf, and that is the consumers of these products. I speak to-day in the interest of the vast mass of working people throughout this country, who can pay no attorneys, who can promise probably no votes, and who have no national organization to press their demands upon Congress.

This is a proposition to deprive millions of people in this country, men working in the mines, in the crowded factory towns, and in the great commercial centers of the country, of a wholesome, legitimate, and nutritious article of food, for there are millions who can not buy butter who are perfectly satisfied with butterine. I will say that the chemist, the expert, the doctor, and everybody else who has been before the committees of the two Houses and given testimony as experts have said that butterine is quite as good an article of food as butter, just as wholesome, just as nutritious, and in several instances they have pronounced it a great deal better. Oleomargarine or butterine is not subject to the decay and the rancidity to which butter is subject. It contains no butyric acid, and is less obnoxious to the delicate stomach than butter. So, according to the scientific testimony of those people who should know, on an average of large experiments, butterine is a better or, at least, as good an article of food as butter.

I do not know that I ever ate any oleomargarine, and I do not think anybody else knows whether he has eaten any. I venture to say there is not a Senator here who can tell the difference between that article and butter. I recollect last year a Senator on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry said one morning that he had been eating oleomargarine the whole winter at his hotel, that he had just heard of it, and his indignation was greatly aroused. I asked if he could not tell it by the smell. "No," he said. "Nor by the color?" "No." "Nor by the taste?" "No." "Nor by the effects upon your digestion?" "No." "Then," I said, "what is the odds whether you eat oleomargarine or butterine or butter if you can not tell the difference in any way whatever?"

But it is said that the position of the committee is to protect the people of the United States from the imposition of a fraudulent product in substitution for another. Mr. President, we are accustomed to say these formal things just as we begin a letter by saying "My dear sir," and end it "Your most obedient servant," or "Yours, truly;" but, as a matter of fact, there would not be a voice raised here to protect anybody from imposition if there was no money behind this bill in the enhanced profits, as they suppose, that are to go to the butter interests of this country.

I am not against the butter interest. I have had any number of petitions here under that stereotyped heading as sent forth by the National Dairymen's Association, imploring me to vote for this bill, and one man wrote to me—and a very good man after his way, I suppose—that if I thought I was doing any service to the dairy people I was badly mistaken. I wrote him that if he thought I was trying to do anything for the dairy people, or any other interested class of people, he was badly mistaken. I am not here to champion any one interest against another; but there is a just indignation in the breasts of those people who are engaged in an honest industry—just as honest as milking and churning—in the production of a good, wholesome article of food, that they should be oppressed and compelled to quit their business, and that the producers of the raw material should suffer in their proper earnings from the effects of such a law as this.

I say, in the first place, Mr. President, that this is an unconstitutional act. It is plainly class legislation. Nobody will deny that it is in the interest of one class; nor is it simply taxing the people generally for the benefit of that class. That is already done. There is to-day a duty of 6 cents a pound on butter. America is the highest butter market in the world. Butter is 6 or 7 cents a pound higher here than in the market of Great Britain, which is supplied mainly by the Danish people, who make the best butter in the world, and it is 9 or 10 cents higher here than in Canada. Canadian butter pays the duty when it comes into this country, and it is exported again with a rebate of 5 cents to enable the exporter to get it in and send it out at the cost of only 1 cent a pound. This is a great protection for butter, at least that was the argument of the men who framed the law and fixed this rate on the importation of butter, which, as I said before, is higher in this country than it is anywhere else on the face of the earth.

Nobody can complain that the dairymen are not doing well. They are doing well. We find that they are doing so well that there is a proposition now to make a grand trust, run by the butter factories of the country, as is stated here by a paper published in Kansas City of a late date.

Big butter trust—Two Kansas men to consolidate all United States creameries—Capital stock, $18,000,000—They already control about 400 creameries in the West.

That is legitimate enterprise, some people will say. Well, let it go at that. I do not attack this consolidation of creameries; but what I do oppose is the taxation of other people for the benefit of these gentlemen in the creamery business.

I say this bill is unconstitutional in respect to its being class legislation, and it is unconstitutional in the tax itself. It has been often said, quoting Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax carries with it the power to destroy; but it also has been said over and over again that when the Government laid its hand upon a citizen to take from him a part of his money for the benefit of another citizen or class of citizens, it was not legislation, but legislative decree under the form of law, and was robbery. That was the opinion delivered in those words by the greatest judge in my time—a Republican judge from the State of Iowa.

Now, I propose, if the Senate will not be wearied by a few legal decisions, to substantiate what I am saying. I deny that this Government has a right to tax anybody, much less to so tax as to exterminate an industry for the benefit of any person or any number of persons, even if there were millions of them. I deny the right of this Government to tax to destruction or to tax at all anybody or anything except for the purposes of government. You must show that the object of the taxation is to raise revenue that will permit this Government to conduct its affairs and administer the affairs of the people in a proper way; to supply the instruments for the enforcement of law, and to do everything that becomes a sovereign in the family of nations in its internal relations to its own citizens and in its external relations to the world.

The greatest case that I know of is the one that is repeated here quite often, and was set forth quite elaborately the other day by my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] in the very able and lucid speech which he submitted to the Senate. It is the case of Loan Association v. Topeka, quoted in 20 Wallace, page 665, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, as I said, the greatest judge in my time; and I want to say further that, although a Republican, when the history of his time is written he will be put down as, next to John C. Calhoun, the strongest States' rights man who ever figured very prominently in this country. Strange he should be a Republican, but it is so. Judge Miller says:

The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy.

But that was a case—I want to call it to mind—where the State of Maryland attempted to tax one of the instrumentalities of the United States, and the denial was that the State could levy a tax at all upon an instrument of this Government, because to tax included the power to destroy.

A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage.

That is the opinion of the judge, but it does not give the argument. The argument was that the Government was then in the stress of war; it was struggling for its national integrity, to preserve itself, rounding out its whole extent of dominion, and money being the principal instrument in conducting a war and absolutely necessary thereto, it was compelled for lack of hard money to issue paper money, and in order to give that a place in the markets and sustain it in its value the Government was compelled to tax out of existence the issues of the State banks. That was the argument, and it was a good one, for the Government had a right to do that.

This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.

That is what is being attempted in this bill. It may be said by my distinguished friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who honors me with his attention, that it is not the intention to exterminate this industry. He does not say that is the intention here, but it is professedly a revenue bill, and Secretary Gage, when invited before the committee, said that if it was a revenue bill it was not needed. We have just passed a bill wiping off the statute books the whole war-revenue taxes because there is a surplus in the Treasury of one hundred and eighty-odd million dollars outside of the $150,000,000 of the gold reserve. So we do not need the money; and if it is not a revenue measure, then it is a misnomer.

Here is a proposition in this bill to add to the wealth of one class of our fellow-citizens, to use the language of this decision, "so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised."

That is evidently the proposition here—to enhance the value of the products of the dairy and to decrease the value of live stock, cotton-seed oil, and lard, and also to destroy millions of dollars invested in butterine and oleomargarine, the making of which is recognized as a legitimate article of commerce by law.

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done in the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

There never were truer words spoken. They are words that ought to carry weight to every mind in this Senate, and if this decision does not fit all around this bill then it does not amount to anything at all.

Nor is it taxation. "A tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by the Government for the use of the nation or State."

I ask you, Senators, is this taxation for the benefit or use of the nation or State? The testimony of Secretary Gage was that if you raised the tax to 10 cents a pound there would be great difficulty about collecting any of it at all. Suppose the industry could bear the tax, how many inducements have you given to those people engaged in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine to evade the law and save the 10 cents per pound? You know when you raised the tax on whisky to $2 a gallon it had to be put down to $1.10 because nobody wanted to pay the tax, and the wit, the enterprise, and the energy of the whisky men were directed to putting whisky on the market without paying the extraordinary tax of $2 per gallon, and the tax had to be reduced in order to increase the revenue derived from that article.

Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes.

Is this tax to be imposed to raise money for public purposes? We do not want any more money. We are trying to reduce the surplus in the Treasury. This is what Judge Miller described here as an attempt to tax one class, or several classes of people, in order to enrich one particular favored class, and that, he declared, is unconstitutional. Is it a public purpose because a hundred, or a thousand, or a million, or ten million dairymen would reap profits from it? That does not make it for a public purpose. The "public" in the law is not the public in the newspaper sense of that word, in the common acceptance of people generally, but it means for governmental purposes, when it says "for public purposes," that the Government must need this money. For what? Not to reward this man or that man, to induce him to extend his operations and increase his private wealth, but to carry on the administration of public affairs; and that is the only sense in which it can be called a public purpose. The determination of the meaning of that phrase "public purpose" runs through a hundred decisions which are not necessary to be cited here, but some of which I will give.

The State ex rel. James Griffith et al. v. Osawkee Township et al. Municipal bonds not issued for public purposes; constitutional law.

The act of the legislature of 1875, entitled "An act authorizing townships to issue bonds for relief purposes," in that it provides for the issue of bonds and the levying of taxes for other than public purposes is unconstitutional and void.

In Lowell v. City of Boston (111 Mass., 454) the court held an act of the legislature unconstitutional and void that authorized the city of Boston to loan, on sufficient security, to the sufferers from a great fire in that city amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $20,000,000, to enable them to rebuild upon their property, because it was an appropriation of public money for private use and made taxation necessary for private purposes.

There was a whole city full to be benefited; that may be called the whole public of Boston, and yet this tax was not for a public but for a private purpose. The Government had no interest in it, it was not necessary for the administration of its affairs, and therefore it was adjudged unconstitutional.

Allen v. Inhabitants of Jay (60 Me., 124):

Taxation, by the very meaning of the term, implies the raising of money for public uses, and excludes the raising of for private objects and purposes.

That is a case in which, I believe, a township asked the legislature of the State to enable it to issue bonds to establish a cotton factory or to give a bonus to a cotton factory, and the legislature granted the request. The factory was built, the taxpayers disputed the act, and it was declared unconstitutional by the Maine court.

In Sharpless v. Mayor, etc. (21 Penn. St., 147), Black, C. J., said:

I concede that a law authorizing taxation for any other than public purposes is void.

Hanson v. Vernon (27 Iowa, 28), Dillon, C. J.:

The acquisition, possession, and protection of property are among the chief ends of government. To take directly or indirectly the property of individuals and loan to others for purposes of private gain and speculation, against the consent of those whose money is loaned, would be to defeat it from the protection of the Constitution, and submit it to the will of an irresponsible majority. It would be robbery and spoliation of those whose estates, or a portion of whose estates, is thus confiscated.

That is pretty strong language—that part of the estate of a butterine factory or of a man who is engaged in raising live stock or cotton producing or hog raising is confiscated by legislative decree under the form of law to enrich the milkmen and dairymen of this country who are already, as I have said, so well protected under a 6 per cent duty that butter is higher here than in any other part of the globe, and not only higher here, but a great deal higher than where the best butter in the world is sold.

Now, here is what Chief Justice Marshall said, in McCulloch v. State of Maryland, to which I referred before:

That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to these very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied.

I beg attention to this one line of the Chief Justice's decision:

How all inconsistencies are to be reconciled by the magic of the word "confidence." Taxation, it is said, does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy. To carry it to excess of destruction would be an abuse, to presume which would banish that confidence which is essential to all government.

In other words, such legislation destroys absolutely in the minds of the people taxed all confidence in the integrity of the legislature which puts into operation such a proposition as this under form of law for the enrichment of one class of its citizens as against another; and, as I said a while ago, it is not simply taxation, but it is the determination to extinguish an industry just as legitimate as any on earth, producing an article not like whisky, to steal away the brain and disintegrate the whole physical and moral nature of man, but a wholesome article of nourishment, accessible to millions of the working people of this country who will be without this necessary article of food if the pending legislation is adopted.

Missouri, etc., Railway Company v. Nebraska (164 U. S., 147; 41 L., 495; 17 S. Ct., 135), in holding State can not take property of one person without owner's consent for use of another person. Atchison, etc., Railroad v. Atchison (11 Kans., 714; 28 Pac., 1001), holding tax levied in aid of private sectarian college void.

Notwithstanding the beneficent influence which would naturally emanate from a college or any institution of learning to the whole people, notwithstanding the fact that it educates a portion of them and elevates to a higher plane intellectually and morally the people of the whole State, yet this provision is declared void upon the protest of a taxpayer.

In the same case it is held:

The taking by a State of the private property of one person or corporation, without the owner's consent, for the private use of another is not due process of law, and is a violation of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Company v. City of Atchison. In error from district court. Opinion by Johnston, J.

While it is argued that the public is benefited by the increase of schools and the spread of learning and knowledge, it is not contended that the colleges in question are under the supervision and control of the public, or that there is or could be any legislative authority for their support. The officers of the city had no power to impose a tax on the property of the citizens of Atchison to aid private sectarian schools or to promote private interests and enterprises.

Citing Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 665.

These decisions seem to me to be very conclusive upon the point of the constitutionality of this measure.

Now, as to the interests concerned—

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. With pleasure.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to ask the Senator his opinion as a lawyer. Suppose this bill is passed; does he think any court would hold it unconstitutional?

Mr. MONEY. The court has evaded the merits of a great many questions by saying that it could not look behind to discern the legislative intent; and when I say that this legislation is unconstitutional I do not mean that any court will ever pronounce it so, although it might, but what I mean is this: That we as legislators must see from these decisions that we are attempting to do a thing which is absolutely unconstitutional, although the court may never make a direct decision upon that point, because in a great many other cases it has said, "We can not go behind the text of the law to inquire into the intent of the lawmakers."

Mr. QUARLES. If I understand the position of my distinguished friend, it is that this measure is unconstitutional, but that no court can ever be made to see it. It is unconstitutional in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. MONEY. Not at all. My friend misunderstood me in toto cetero if he imagines anything of the sort.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, it is unconstitutional in the Senate, but not in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MONEY. I did not say that, either. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin for his able assistance. I did not say that. Neither do I think I am making so strong an argument that it needs to be misrepresented or misunderstood. I do not say that it can not reach the Supreme Court, nor do I say what the Supreme Court will say; but I do say that a great many unconstitutional measures have been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that it must consider the text of the measure, and that it has no right to go behind that text to inquire into the legislative intent; that when the Congress of the United States says it had before it a bill which it made into a law for the purpose of raising revenue to carry on the Government, although in fact the court must know, from all the circumstances surrounding it, from general information which courts generally take cognizance of (and they are as much called upon to do so as they are of the law or the Constitution), yet the court must say, "We will not go behind to convict the legislature of fraud."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi this question: If the record could be made up of a case to be submitted to the Supreme Court, in which it were admitted, as it is virtually admitted in this debate, that the tax of 10 cents a pound is not levied in order to raise revenue but to drive colored oleomargarine out of the market, what is his opinion as to the judgment of the Supreme Court?

Mr. MONEY. There would not be a single moment's hesitation, and there would not have been a single moment's hesitation in a number of cases which have been passed upon by the court. Change the title of this bill, or change a section, and instead of "raising revenue" say on the face of it, "Here is a bill to drive out of existence an industry that is injuring by its competition, and honest competition, another industry," and you would see what the Supreme Court would do with it. I challenge the majority of the committee, who have reported this bill, to change it in one single instance, so that the court may honestly come to a decision upon that point, without the necessity of challenging the purpose and intent of the political power of the Government.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if his argument is not really sixteen years old? His argument, it seems to me, might have had some relevancy and pertinency to the law which was enacted sixteen years ago, but as applying to this measure, which is merely an amendment of that law, which has stood the fire of the courts all of these years, it seems to me it has not much effect. I should like him to discuss this as an amendment to the existing law.

Mr. MONEY. In reply my distinguished friend the Senator from Kansas, I will say that I am discussing this on principle. I do not care whether it is an amendment or an original bill or a substitute or what not; the form of it is nothing. It is the principle of the bill; that is what I am discussing. I care not what the court said sixteen years ago. Any number of precedents can not deter legislators from performing their duty as they see it. We are not bound in legislating by a decision of the court. There may be any number of decisions, but they have nothing more than a persuasive power upon the minds of men enacting law. It is a good thing that we have to come back really to first principles and reject decisions and judgments and precedents and get down to fundamental principles once in a while, in order to secure the rights of the people of this country. If we drift on the tide of precedents, one getting a little worse than the other all the time, no man on earth can tell where we will land.

But I venture to say there never will be a bill framed, with an honest title to it, which can pass the Supreme Court of the United States or any other court of competent jurisdiction as to its constitutionality. Gentlemen must hide behind a cover. Talk about the fraud of oleomargarine. It is a molehill as to a mountain compared with the fraud that is perpetrated upon the country and upon the court when a bill professing one thing means an entirely different thing. Everybody knows as well as the Secretary of the Treasury that there is no need of this tax. Everybody knows that by the unanimous vote of both Houses the Congress has swept off of the statute book a whole system of internal-revenue taxation. We all know that. We know it is hard to get rid of the $183,000,000 of surplus, which ought to be in circulation among the people of this country to quicken and enliven commerce in all its avenues.

I said the determination is to exterminate this industry. I have the testimony of men who have been sent here to effect legislation to that end. Mr. Hoard, who I believe is the chairman of the National Dairymen's Association, a gentleman of very high character, an ex-governor, said in his testimony before the House committee, when asked about this bill, that if it did not succeed in stamping out the industry he would be here next winter with one that did; and Mr. Knight, the secretary I believe of one of these associations, who has been a sort of dry nurse to the committees of both Houses until he was expelled from the committee room of one of them, or was not permitted to go in, has been collecting all sorts of testimony, and we find a letter of his to the Virginia dairymen, in which he says: "Now is the time to clip the fangs of this octopus and destroy it." We can not account for his mixed-up metaphors. An octopus has tentacles and not fangs.

Mr. Adams, who represents the State of Illinois, I believe, comes in and says, "The purpose of our bill is to exterminate this business; to wipe it out of existence." The effect was not good upon the committee. However much the committee was committed to a proposition of this sort, it could not quite have it declared openly, al fresco, "We are going to exterminate one industry by taxing it in order to benefit another." So he went before the committee and declared he was misunderstood, but when he said that the committee rose up and said, "You were well understood," and the minority of the committee print in their report the statement that he did say what he was reported to have said. The testimony is full on that subject. I could read you any quantity of stuff. I can not find what I want, but I will go away from that point. I believe it is exhausted.

I do not believe there is a man in the committee or in the Senate who believes that this bill is for any other purpose than to wipe out of existence the butterine or oleomargarine business, to destroy the money invested in it, for the purpose of relieving the butter men of a competitor, a competitor who undersells them in the market upon a grade of goods satisfactory to the consumer, with a protected market which makes it the highest in the world, so that the dairyman can absolutely buy Canadian butter, pay the 6 cents tax, get the rebate of 5, and export it abroad. And yet with all this protection the dairymen come here and ask that Congress lay an additional burden upon the cotton-seed men and the live-stock men and the hog-raising men, and at the same time tax out of existence a lawful industry, an industry just as lawful as theirs, producing just as good an article of food.

Now, that is the purpose, and there is not a man here who will deny it, in my opinion. They protect themselves by the title and the phraseology of the bill from any inspection of the purposes by the Supreme Court of the United States. That shield has been put up over and over again.

Now, a great many people will be deprived of a wholesome food article by this act, assuming that it will operate as its friends desire. If it does not so operate, I suppose we will have Mr. Hoard back here next year and there will be another bill introduced, imposing a tax of 20 cents or doubling the inspection or something of that sort, still further to injure and embarrass or destroy this legitimate industry producing a wholesome article of food for the millions of this country who can not buy a higher priced article of food.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, if it will not interrupt him?

Mr. MONEY. Not at all. This is not susceptible of interruption.

Mr. SPOONER. If oleomargarine is innocuous, as I assume it is—

Mr. MONEY. It is, anyhow.

Mr. SPOONER. May be it is and maybe it is not.

Mr. MONEY. It is.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. MONEY. You are not an expert.

Mr. SPOONER. Unfortunately, I have been swindled in using it.

Mr. MONEY. It did not hurt you.

Mr. SPOONER. It hurt a member of my family. I think a man who wants to use in his family oleomargarine ought to be permitted to do it.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly; I admit that.

Mr. SPOONER. But I think a man who wants to buy butter and has oleomargarine palmed off on him for butter is swindled.

Mr. MONEY. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator admit that this is largely sold as butter?

Mr. MONEY. No; I do not. I think it is sometimes, but not largely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This discussion has been contrary to the rule.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Chair is right.

Mr. MONEY. I yielded with pleasure to my distinguished friend, because this is a free-for-all and a go-as-you-please sort of matter, and I do not care how much interruption there is.

That brings me to this point. The weight of testimony is almost overwhelming that there is no fraud practiced by the wholesale dealer, and no complaint is made, and Mr. Gage testified that he collected the tax as easily as any other tax; that he had no more trouble than he had with any other tax, and that it was much more easy to collect it than some of the other taxes, because a tax is evaded in the proportion that there is reward for its evasion.

It is said also that the wholesale dealer has not imposed upon the retail dealer. I hope my distinguished friend the Senator from Wisconsin will listen to this. It is directly in line with his question. I dislike to beg his attention, but it is in answer to his question, if he please. The testimony is that the manufacturer does not deceive, nor does he desire to, and the wholesale dealer does not deceive anybody. But the complaint is that here and there a retail dealer, in some small instance, does deceive the purchaser.

I want to say here that I am just as much in favor of preventing an imposition upon the consumer as any man in this Chamber. I am as ready and will go as far as any other man to prevent it, and I have here the substitute bill, which is offered by the minority as a measure which will prevent imposition in a degree very far exceeding that of the bill presented by the majority, except in so far as the majority suppress the industry. I am glad to call attention to the substitute, and I desire to read it. Here it is:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine,' approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows."

I meet my friend the Senator from Kansas right there. The substitute is proposed as an amendment to the existing law. I have done, not in my own person, but for the minority, exactly what the Senator from Kansas says should be done. We have amended the old law so as to protect the innocent consumers from imposition and fraud on the part of the retail dealer, and that is the only place where the fraud is asserted to come in. Here is the provision:

SEC. 1. That all oleomargarine shall be packed by the manufacturer thereof in firkins, tubs, or other wooden packages not before used for that purpose, each containing not less than 5 pounds, and marked, stamped, and branded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe: Provided, That when such packages are packed in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps the word "oleomargarine" shall be impressed in sunken letters, the size to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury on all prints, bricks, rolls, and lumps so packed; and all sales made by manufacturers of oleomargarine and wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall be in original stamped packages. Retail dealers in oleomargarine must sell only from original stamped packages, in quantities not exceeding 10 pounds, and only in original stamped packages when packed in solid bulk, or in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps, as received from the manufacturer. Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver any oleomargarine in any other form than in the original packages as above described, or in prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps, as received from the manufacturer, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not more than two years.

SEC. 2. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows: Manufacturers shall pay $600 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in greater quantities than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein, but any manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own product only at the place of its manufacture, in the original packages to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $24 per annum. Every person who sells oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein.

That is the provision of the substitute proposing to amend the law as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, and in accord with his suggestion we have endeavored to throw around the consumer protection from imposition or fraud. There is no attempt here to destroy one industry for the benefit of another. There is no inequality in this. There is no injustice. I consider this bill as a totally immoral instrument, for the reasons I have given and others which I will adduce.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I desire to ask, for information, a question of the Senator from Mississippi, who is familiar with this subject.

It is whether the sole object of the pending bill is to impose a tax on oleomargarine which is colored in imitation of genuine butter, leaving it open to manufacture oleomargarine and sell it without the imposition of a tax, provided it is not so colored as to convey the impression to those who may purchase it that it is genuine butter?

Mr. MONEY. That is what they say in the bill.

Mr. RAWLINS. Then, one other inquiry in that connection, and I should like to hear the Senator upon it. He is making an interesting argument. How, then, will this bill or the imposition of this tax, as provided in the bill, destroy a legitimate industry? If oleomargarine is wholesome, if it is equally nutritious, if it in every way commends itself to the consumer as a desirable article, why will it not stand upon its merits without any attempt to imitate any other article which may be upon the market?

Mr. MONEY. There are a dozen answers to that question, and it opens up an illimitable field. I could reply by asking another question: Why do all the creameries color their butter? Take the renovators or resurrectors of stale, rancid, sour butter, collected from a thousand or a million storehouses throughout the South and the West, placed in great cauldrons and heated to 212°. Some of it stinks; some of it is sour. It is remade with the aid of chemicals to deprive it of its odor, which makes it absolutely injurious to the consumer; and that product is permitted to be sold and colored. Why are they not deprived of the privilege of coloring their product? Why not make the man who makes white butter sell it white? I will tell you the reason why. Because the taste—I do not mean the palate—must be satisfied as well as the palate.

I once asked a retail grocer in my town who had canned goods on his shelf, "How do you sell these things?"

He said "so and so." "Now," he said "I want to tell you a singular fact. We have tomato cans. I can sell unlimited quantities of tomatoes put up in a can with a red and yellow label, and if you put a black and white label on the same tomato can you can never sell a can." They were the same tomatoes, they were just as good, they were just as palatable, they were just as digestible, but the cans had an unattractive label on them. So the public has demanded golden butter, yellow butter, Jersey butter, or California butter, and so on, which is presumed—it is a violent presumption—to be all yellow. As a matter of fact, butter is not yellow, but the great majority of it is white. Now, we come in here and we demand that one manufacturer of a made article shall not color it and the other is permitted to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Butter colored is still butter, is it not?

Mr. MONEY. I suppose so, with the added ingredients.

Mr. SPOONER. Oleomargarine in the similitude is simply hog fat?

Mr. MONEY. No; it is simply oleomargarine.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the difference?

Mr. MONEY. And black is still black and white is still white, and so we could go on endlessly with that sort of logic.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MONEY. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator did me the honor to allude to me a little while ago in reference to an amendment which has been proposed by the minority of the committee. That amendment requires, as I understand, that the bricks or blocks of butter shall be stamped with the word "oleomargarine." The present law, I believe, requires that the paper in which oleomargarine is wrapped and sold shall be stamped with the word "oleomargarine." That law, as we know, is constantly being violated. Instead of selling it in a paper stamped with the word "oleomargarine" it is constantly (and I speak from personal knowledge) sold without that stamp. Now, what would prevent the same dishonest retailer from obliterating, with a stroke of a knife, the words impressed upon the brick of butter, just as he now fails to comply with the existing law?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, in answer to that I will say that there never was yet a law framed by human ingenuity that evaded the lawbreaker. We hang people for murder, and they still murder. The illicit distillers still sell moonshine whisky. So men from some of the States in the Union sell terra alba to be mixed with flour. Wheat is the staff of life, and the people of the land are poisoned by wholesale assassinations. These things can not be prevented; and I do not believe it is the province of this Government to step in and prevent people from being imposed upon in transactions of that sort.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the Senator ought not to have introduced any such amendment as he now proposes from the minority of the committee.

Mr. MONEY. I think it is so much superior to the majority measure, at least in principle, and that is what I am talking about, as I said, that I shall stick to it. But I shall be very willing, as far as I am concerned, to accept, and I believe I speak for the minority, any proposition that the Senator from Kansas or any other Senator will offer here that will make more perfect the impossibility of imposing a single ounce of any substitute for butter upon the public.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, that is wholly and entirely the object of the bill which is now being discussed. It is to perfect—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas ought to pause until he gets permission from the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will give the same credit of honesty to those who are in favor of this bill I think he will admit that the whole object of the bill is to perfect an existing law and to prevent fraud.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, it is exceedingly painful to me to disagree with anything that is concluded by the Senator from Kansas, but I do not believe anything of the sort. I do not believe that there is any intention or design particularly worthy of mention to protect anybody from anything, but I do believe the purpose is to enrich one class at the expense of another and to destroy an industry in order to do it. I say that that is unprecedented in legislative history here. I will not say abroad, because I believe they did it once.

Probably some one here more familiar with history can correct me if I am wrong—if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] were here he could correct me—but I believe that once the British Empire prohibited the colonies from making certain things of iron and steel, and in order to recompense them for the loss forbade the cultivation of tobacco in England, where it could not grow. These things have happened frequently, and I have been looking for somebody here to introduce a bill in behalf of the Filipinos to compensate them for what we have done to them by providing that nobody shall raise Manila hemp or Nipa grass in Connecticut or somewhere else in the United States, as a compensation for a little bit of robbery.

Of course there is a great agreement of the people interested in this measure, and that reminds me of what poor old Sam Cox used to say about these protection measures when it was announced that everybody who was a beneficiary of the spoliation was harmonized. I can recollect when the celebrated McKinley bill was passed it was said that everyone who went into the committee room wrote with his hand what he wanted in the bill, and it was considered a perfect bill because they had agreed about it. Sam Cox called that the mutuality of rascality. That is a pretty hard term, perhaps, but it was said in his jocular vein, and nobody took offense at all. He designated it as "the mutuality of rascality," and there were people everywhere who were not harmonized, the people who had to pay the money and get nothing back; and they ought always to dissent.

There are other objections to this bill besides the one I have mentioned. I could go on indefinitely talking on the bill. Here is a provision, for instance, in the very first section:

That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Now, if this destroys the decision of the Supreme Court in the original package case, where is the power of the Government of the United States to regulate internal commerce? The State could not prevent the introduction from another State of its articles of manufacture or production in the original package. We attempt here by legislation on the part of Congress to confer power upon the sovereign States of this Union. The sovereign States of this Union made the Constitution. They conceded certain of their own sovereign powers in order to establish a more perfect Union, and they reserved to themselves all things not delegated or necessary and implied to carry out the delegated grant of power.

Here is Congress attempting to confer sovereign power upon a State. No lawyer knows better than my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that the police power is an inherent and an inalienable right in every community.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the original-package law of 1890 was declared constitutional and valid in full by the united court in the habeas corpus case which came up from Kansas, reported in 140 United States.

Mr. MONEY. That is just what I said.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understood the Senator to say that this attempt to confer power upon the State to exercise its police jurisdiction over articles of interstate commerce was unconstitutional.

Mr. MONEY. I did, but that has nothing to do with the case you cite. The case you cite exactly supports what I say. The United States has power to regulate commerce, and therefore a State can not prevent the introduction within its limits of a prohibited article of manufacture in that State when it comes in the original package. This section is an attempt to do away with that decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. DOLLIVER. On the contrary, the Supreme Court of the United States in Leisy v. Hardin decided that articles of interstate commerce coming into a State did not, until they had been once sold in the original packages, commingle in such a way with the property of the State as to come within its police jurisdiction.

Mr. MONEY. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Without the consent of Congress.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Without the consent of Congress.

Mr. MONEY. That is all right; there is no difficulty about that. But here is a proposition to confer power upon the State by the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Supreme Court, in the case—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is out of order.

Mr. MONEY. Of course I yield to the Senator from Iowa. The interruption is perfectly agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In the case of Leisy v. Hardin, the Chief Justice expressly stated that if Congress did confer power by special act upon the State then the State could exercise it.

Mr. SPOONER. If Congress gives consent?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Removal of obstruction was the language of the court. So this first provision follows verbatim the language of the original-package law of 1890, which has been affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. MONEY. I understand all that, Mr. President. The Senator from Iowa brings up the matter just exactly as I understand it. But notwithstanding, that leaves me in the same position I was before. There is no sovereign power that can be conferred upon the States by Congress. The Constitution, which was the work of the people of the States creating Congress, creating the Government of the United States for the government of the nation, reserved expressly in two amendments all the powers not therein expressly delegated or implied. Therefore it is beyond the reach, it is ultra vires entirely, of Congress to confer sovereign power, such as the police powers especially, which are inalienable and not impugnable also.

Now, the committee struck out also a whole section of the bill that was inserted as a part of the House bill. Now, I want the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] particularly to this, as he is so much interested in protection and not so much in revenue in this matter. I am speaking, of course, with great respect, but it seems to me to be the real moving cause in this matter that it is in somebody's interest and not the desire to protect the unsophisticated workingman who wants oleomargarine and goes and buys it. Here is what is stricken out by the Senate committee:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection—to be made from time to time, and at such times as he may deem necessary, of all factories and storehouses where butter is renovated; and all butter renovated at such places shall be carefully inspected in the same manner and to the same extent and purpose that meat products are now inspected. The quantity and quality of butter renovated shall be reported monthly. All renovated butter shall be designated as such by marks, brands, and labels, and the words "Renovated Butter" shall be printed on all packages thereof, in such a manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be sold only as renovated butter.

Note the words—

Here is what they did with oleomargarine:

Any persons violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $500, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful sanitary and other rules and regulations for carrying this section into effect. And no renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from one State to another or to foreign countries, unless inspected as provided in this section.

Here is an opportunity to protect the consumer, not from a wholesome article of food full of albumen, but from a substance that is unfit to eat; that confessedly in its manufacture involves the use of chemicals as a disinfectant and deodorizer that makes it injurious to the human stomach—rancid and sour butter collected from the four corners of the world and carried to these vast renovated or resurrected butter establishments, put in caldrons and heated and mixed with chemicals and the other things, and brought out and colored with annatto or some other substance, the coloring matter being harmless, I believe, and it is palmed off as butter. Yet here is a provision to protect the innocent purchaser from imposition and fraud, and it is stricken from the bill. Oleomargarine will hurt nobody. If a man is imposed on he is not injured, although I would not have him imposed on. But here is a case where he is imposed on and injured, and a provision for the protection of the purchaser, which this committee has thrown its whole heart into, is stricken from the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MONEY. With great pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a supporter of the measure now under consideration, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that when the time for voting upon the provision which he has just referred to arrives I shall be glad to join with him in keeping it in the bill. I think it ought to be kept in the bill.

Mr. MONEY. Very well, I shall be very happy to have the able assistance of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President—

Mr. MONEY. And of the Senator from Vermont, too.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MONEY. With pleasure. Did you mean to say that you would join me in this?

Mr. PROCTOR. For the committee I wish to say that we looked upon that provision in regard to renovated butter as so imperfect in its machinery that it would be inoperative. Striking it out does not indicate that the committee were opposed to such a provision. There are two bills now pending in another body in regard to renovated butter. The committee have been comparing those measures, and I hope before this bill comes to final action an amendment may be submitted in lieu of the provision stricken out that will reach that purpose. I think there is no disagreement about it.

Mr. MONEY. I will have little confidence in keeping it in the bill. It is very easy to offer something here to perfect it. It was just as easy to perfect this paragraph by substituting one of the bills before the committee of the House and none before the Senate committee as it was to strike it out. If there is any desire to protect the people, why not perfect here this imperfect arrangement for inspection and for the protection of the consumer?

No, Mr. President, the fact is that here is an additional seller of butter employed in making this fraudulent article that is imposed upon people as good butter. Here is an opportunity to extend the sale of the product of the cow and the churn. Therefore it is stricken out. I want this whole subject to go along and not to take it by piecemeal. Why did not the committee present here the matter that was pending in the House bill? The document is accessible in the document room. It could have been offered here and substituted for this section, but it was not done.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Vermont expects to do it.

Mr. MONEY. He is trying to round out this bill and to perfect it to absolutely disarm any suspicion that there is an unfair treatment of one product at the expense of another. There could not have been anything said on the subject—at least of protection—except that behind it all was interest. I do not, of course, mean the gentlemen who are voting on this bill; I mean the interest of a class of people, and one of the best classes. There is no attempt here on my part, I am sure, to disparage it in any way. I own milk cows myself. I make Jersey butter. I do not sell it; I eat it. I do not know that anybody eats oleomargarine in my State. There is one thing about it, though, it will keep where butter will not; it can be carried where butter can not.

That brings me right back to an answer to the question of my friend here, and I will just mention that—the question of suiting the taste, and why white oleomargarine will not sell. It is calculated by those who seem to understand the subject that about 75 per cent of the 83,000,000 pounds would not be consumed if it were not colored. The last year's product was about 110,000,000 pounds. Now, you have got to cater to the eye as well as to the palate. For instance, we export oleomargarine to the West Indies. What is the color of it? It is not white; it is not yellow; it is a brilliant red. Why? Because the darkies down there want red butter or red oleomargarine. That suits their taste. It is like a red shirt or a red cravat—

Mr. TILLMAN. Or red lemonade.

Mr. MONEY. Or red lemonade at a circus, or the red label on a tomato can, or anything of that sort. You have got to please your customer or he will not trade with you.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MONEY. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that if all butter were white, oleomargarine would be colored at all?

Mr. MONEY. I think that whenever you begin to make the prevailing tint of butter white and the public taste demands it the oleomargarine man also will need his to be white, because both classes are suiting the taste of the people to whom they sell. And I want to say now that some crack hotels in this country are putting white butter on the table to-day instead of yellow.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator did not answer my question; he ran away from it.

Mr. MONEY. Oh, I did not mean to run, I assure you.

Mr. SPOONER. If all butter were white, does the Senator think oleomargarine would be colored?

Mr. MONEY. I answered that. I said it would not be—

Mr. SPOONER. Oh.

Mr. MONEY. I said it as plainly as I could.

Mr. SPOONER. I have it now.

Mr. MONEY. I am not in the habit of running away, or evading, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not mean that.

Mr. MONEY. Of course the Senator was in good humor. I take it that way; and I want to say, in the first instance—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This conversation between the Senators is out of order.

Mr. MONEY. It is addressed to the President of the Senate, if you please.

Mr. President, I said a while ago that there are millions of poor people in this country who could not buy butter and they can buy oleomargarine, and it is the confident belief of people in the business that the 10 per cent tax will destroy their industry.

Now, the question has been raised whether, if the butter gets the benefit of that 10 per cent which protected articles generally do, although sometimes the home competition reduces it, will we not then be flooded with the butter of Canada, which would pay only six cents per pound rate of duty, and would it not come in here and compete with the Vermont farmer, as good as his butter is and as cheap as he can make it? Certainly, it will not raise the price of Canadian butter from 21 and 22 cents to 25 or 26 cents, and there would be a big profit in Canadian butter. Would it not invite competition from Denmark, from Australia, and from other countries that make butter, because this is the highest butter market in the world, as gentlemen know? Although we export some of our butter, yet we buy and sell exactly the same article that is made in almost every country in the world, unless there is something peculiar in the soil or climate.

To get back to the proposition about the people who use oleomargarine, I have just received this morning, at the hands of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], a letter addressed to him, which I take the liberty of reading, by his permission:

JOPLIN, MO., March 14, 1902.

HON. GEORGE G. VEST,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a consumer of butterine, speaking for myself and in behalf of the working class in the Joplin mining district—

Joplin is a great mining district in Missouri, as you all know—aggregating some 100,000, including dependents, I take the liberty of urging that you cast your vote and use your influence against the passage of the oleomargarine bill. It is necessary in this locality, in order to enjoy the use on our tables of anything having the semblance of butter, to use butterine. I have used it in my own household for eight years, and grade for grade, compared with butter, I can honestly state that we prefer the butterine.

There is no accounting for tastes.

The retail price of the so-called butter offered in this market makes its use prohibited, so far as the laboring man here is concerned, and a 10-cent tax on butterine will result in depriving him and his family of both butter and butterine.

In passing, I may add that I have mining interests in New Mexico, where I spend more or less of my time. To the thousands engaged in mining, prospecting, and lumbering in all of that mountain region the passage of the bill will be little less than a calamity. Butterine there is as staple an article of diet as canned beef.

Trusting that you can see your way clear to vote against the passage of the bill, I am,

Yours, very truly,

C. W. STEPHENS.

This gentleman employs several thousand men in mines in New Mexico and in the Joplin district in Missouri.

Mr. President, as I have previously stated, the cry of the poor should be heard here as well as the cry of the protected interests who want more money at the expense of other people. When I say "the cry of the poor," I mean the working poor as well as the dependent poor; I mean the stalwart millions whose brawn and muscle and brain and energy make the great bulk of the things we use and export; who create the wealth of this country, and who are the underpinning and foundation of every industrial enterprise in the Union. The men at the forges, in the mines, in the factories, in the commercial establishments everywhere, want this bill defeated. They have addressed themselves to this Congress by every means that they know; they have had their representatives come here and present memorials and address committees; and there can not be the slightest difference of opinion as to the fact that the working people are against this bill.

May I be permitted, if you please, to read some—I shall not read it all—but just a small portion of the statements which have been made by representatives of various labor organizations in reference to this bill?

Mr. Patrick Dolan, president of the United Mine Workers' Association, testified as follows:

Our people, Mr. Chairman, are against the passage of the measure. I represent over 40,000 miners and their families, and I know from the sentiment in other sections of the country to which I go, from talking to people who are interested in our organization, that they do not want to be deprived of the ability to purchase this wholesome article of food. If it is not made in a wholesome way, then they do not want it; but if it is just as good to them to spread their bread with as 35-cent butter, they do want it. And if this measure passes, the chances are that butter will go up to 50 cents and poor people will not be able to purchase it at all.

If butter does not go up, it will be an extreme disappointment to the supporters of this measure, for then its whole object will have failed.

Mr. John Pierce, representing the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, said:

Colored oleomargarine is at present retailed at from 12½ to 20 cents per pound. On investigation I am satisfied that most of our people are paying about 15 cents per pound for it, and I can not admit that those who buy it can afford to pay more. I therefore arrive at the conclusion that they must either find 10 cents per pound more to pay this proposed robbery (for I can not dignify it by the name of tax) or buy and eat white oleomargarine. And this to satisfy the greed of the manufacturers of butter, who think that white oleomargarine is good enough for those who can not afford to pay 10 cents additional for yellow, or the 20 cents or more additional for creamery butter, or use the off grades of butter now unsalable as food.

Senators, you are going to hear a great deal of the same kind of talk from the working people this fall when the stump is surrounded by those who listen to aspirants for office and place.

I will say here, Mr. President, that if, under the rules of the Senate, this bill could be voted for by secret ballot it would not get a dozen votes. I am brought to that conclusion from such remarks as those I have just read. Mr. Pierce further said:

Shall those thus defrauded of what should be their inalienable constitutional right be compelled either to wear in their homes, on their very tables, flaunting before the eyes of their children and of those who may share their board, a badge of their poverty, and an emblem of their inability to pay a legalized robbery; or, on the other hand, to contribute from their meager board to the hellish greed of the butter interests, of whom it has been doubtless truly said that they seek to follow the fashion and form a trust, but are deterred by the existence of oleomargarine?

They are not much deterred, I should think, according to the report in the Kansas City papers, where the butter trust has been organized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a good many of our people who make pretty good wages, and of course they can buy butter; but the majority of them make small wages now, especially since we got into this trust business. I know there are lots of men who do not like to buy this white oleomargarine, because it looks more like lard than anything else. It does not look like butter at all. Why should they be made to pay 10 cents a pound more because they get butter that resembles country butter and looks a little better on the table? That is why I am here to oppose the passage of this bill. It is for our people alone, for of course I do not know much about the butter business myself.

The people who use oleomargarine do not seem to be afraid that they are going to be imposed upon by anybody. They go into a store and ask for oleomargarine; they do not want butter and they do not propose to buy it, because they can not pay for it, and this protection, which is volunteered and vouchsafed to those people, they entirely repudiate.

They want to be able to take care of themselves and not be coddled in any such way as this bill proposes. This Government, in my opinion, has no business to be protecting anybody from imposition by anybody else in a trade like this, unless it can be shown that the article imposed upon the consumer is deleterious or injurious to health, morals, intellect, or something else; and it has been shown that oleomargarine is a perfectly innocent commercial article and its purchasers do not desire to be protected from the dealer.

Mr. John F. McNamee, vice-president and chairman legislative committee Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly, Columbus, Ohio, said:

The members of organized labor are thoroughly familiar with all of the phases of this bill. They speak about the chemical analyses which have been made of oleomargarine by official chemists, and they discuss all of the various components and ingredients of the product with almost as much familiarity as the manufacturers themselves are capable of doing. So, I say, that they are wide awake to the necessity, in the protection of their own interests, of having the bill defeated.

They do not want to be protected by the bill, except by its defeat. That is the protection they ask from Congress—the defeat of this iniquitous legislation which proposes to discriminate against them and to compel them to do without a necessary article of food. There must be something to go with the cereal. You can not eat flour; you have got to have something like lard, butter, oleomargarine, butterine, or oil with it. A great many people in the Tropics do not eat butter or butterine at all. They use olive oil, and the Government of Italy some years ago prohibited cotton-seed oil to be imported, because it interfered with the olive-oil industry; in fact, it was better than the olive oil.

Mr. McNamee proceeded to say:

Not only that, but as patriotic American citizens they feel deeply the indignity to which our legislative bodies have been subjected by this attempt to utilize them for the promotion of the interests of certain individuals and corporations, in violation of every sense of right and justice and at the expense of the constitutional prerogatives of other citizens.

These workingmen come here to protect you, Senators, and they say they are indignant because it is attempted to use you as the instruments of these corporate interests in order to extract from the people a tax for the support of such interests and to enhance their earnings at the expense of the working people of this country and deprive them of an article of food. They say they are jealous of your dignity and protest that you should not levy a tax of 10 cents a pound at the butterine counter or the oleomargarine counter. It seems to me that we are getting into a retail business here. The great United States of America, the greatest nation in the world, discarding constitutional principles, the equal rights of all of its citizens, the protection and the equality of all men before the law, has got down, not to the manufacturer, not to the wholesale dealer, but has got down to the transactions between the petty shopkeeper and the man who comes with his tin pail desiring to purchase butterine or oleomargarine, to protect him against buying the very thing he comes there to buy. We have got into a small business.

They feel that the legislative bodies of some of our States and the Congress of the United States have been insulted by this attempt to utilize them as tools for the protection of certain interests which can not sustain themselves against competitors.

I do not agree with them about that. Butter has sustained itself, and I am very glad that butter has done so. I do not want to hurt the butter interest; I would not hurt any legitimate interest on earth; but the record shows that butter has steadily improved in price ever since the invention of oleomargarine. There has not been any loss. The protection of 6 cents a pound has been ample to keep the home market, to enable us to buy it and then export it, and at the same time the price of good butter has gone steadily up; in fact, in order to secure a market at a good price to-day, good butter must be made. Oleomargarine is so good that a great number of people would use oleomargarine if butter were not made better year by year.

Mr. McNamee said further:

Gentlemen, there are hundreds of thousands of our citizens in moderate circumstances who are now looking to the United States Senate for protection against the perpetration of such a gross injustice.

That is the protection that some of them want. They want protection against the greed of these interests coming here and using the strong hand of the Government in legislation to take money out of the pocket of one man and put it in the pocket of another. It is protection against that that the workingman wants. He does not call for this bill, but he calls for you to vote against this bill; and I guess the friends of the workingman will vote that way, and vote to protect his interests.

Mr. McNamee continues:

They are depending absolutely upon that sense of justice, that sense of honor, fair play, and conservatism which has always characterized this body to protect them from this, one of the most culpable violations of their rights which any individual or combination of individuals has ever attempted to perpetrate upon the American public.

This representative of labor talks well. He would do well in a seat in this Senate. He could express himself as vigorously, as lucidly, as clearly, and as much to the point as any Senator in this Chamber, and he has a right to be heard for what he says. He continues further:

They are looking to this body with the firm hope that its traditional love of justice will prevail and predominate in this crisis. Should this measure become a law, arising from the mists of the near future there will come a monster into whose insatiable maw the contributions of our citizens shall continually flow, and whose appetite shall be increased by all attempts at its gratification.

That has been the observation of mankind through all the ages. Greed grows by what it feeds on. Goldsmith says:

In vain our flocks and fields increase our store,
Our having riches only makes us wish for more.

At the expense of somebody else. If this butter trust had the whole of this earth for a grazing ground, they would still want a corner of the moon for a cow pen. [Laughter.]

This monster we have all, in our apprehensive conviction of the certainty of its existence, learned to regard as the creamery trust of the future, the combination of creamery interests into one great organization, which shall monopolize the manufacture not only of the food product known as butter, but of everything of that nature.

That "apprehensive conviction" is about to be realized by this great trust now being organized, including already 400 creameries and with a capital of $18,000,000. This man spoke with a spirit of prophecy upon him; he had a live coal from the altar on his lips.

That octopus is now being conceived. If the United States Senate should consent to the passage of a bill so outrageously unjust as this one is, then its birth will have been accomplished.

Here the Senate of the United States is called upon by the interested parties to be accoucheur at the birth of this monstrous octopus, as this laboring man calls it. I do not know whether he knew the meaning of the word or not, but he knew the thing, and that is well enough.

I might go on reading indefinitely from the statements pertaining to this matter by representatives of organized labor. Here is an expression from one of the largest representative labor bodies in the United States—the Chicago Federation of Labor—and here is what they say relative to the tax:

We believe the efforts to place a tax of 10 cents per pound on colored butterine is inspired by selfish motives, so that the manufacturers of butter may charge an unreasonable price for their commodity and enable the large creameries to establish surely and securely a butter trust which may raise prices as their cupidity may dictate.

That has happened. Here is another man who comes with a prophecy or prediction that is being verified to-day by this butter trust which is being formed in the United States. Here is another expression from another source:

Justice demands equal rights for both manufacturers of butter and butterine, both products having equal merit. Any adverse legislation against either must be condemned.

There are statements in the report of the minority from the painters and decorators, composed of a large number of people of Cleveland, Ohio, from the home of our distinguished and brilliant junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], who has always beneficently and benevolently occupied himself in adjusting the little differences between labor and capital, and who, I am quite sure, as a lover of the laboring man, would oppose this bill with all his known energy and ability if he should happen to be here.

Then here are resolutions of the Chicago Federation of Labor, which ought to interest the Illinois Senators, which condemn this legislation in strong terms. They say they are opposed to the dairymen's trust, or the butter trust, or whatever it is called; that they want to protect and uphold the dignity of Congress and to protect themselves from such legislation as is here proposed.

That is what these people want. They want to be let alone a little bit. But here are people going around dropping their legitimate business to protect people in an infinitesimally small retail transaction, because there is no pretense of fraud anywhere else except in the retail business, or, if there is a pretense, it is nothing more than a pretense. There is neither justification nor excuse nor any palliation for any charge that the manufacturers and the wholesale dealers have engaged in any such thing. It is all in the retail trade, and that is a very small business. I could read much more testimony to the Senate.

Among the scientists who testified as to oleomargarine being wholesome and nutritious, I would mention Prof. C. F. Chandler, professor of chemistry at Columbia College, New York; Prof. George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Henry Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, New Jersey; Prof. S. W. Johnson, director of the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station and professor of agricultural chemistry in Yale College. I will read what Professor Johnson says:

It is a product that is entirely attractive and wholesome as food, and one that is for all ordinary and culinary purposes the full equivalent of good butter made from cream. I regard the manufacture of oleomargarine as a legitimate and beneficent industry.

I want to say right now to Senators that the butterine man or the oleomargarine man is not hostile to the cow. The farmers in northern Ohio, in some parts of New York, and in other portions of the country do not themselves use the milk of their cows, but sell it to cheese factories, and so it is all over the country. They send it to the creameries, and vast quantities are really sold to and used in the butterine factories and the oleomargarine factories, which must have 25 per cent of pure sweet milk, in which they churn the ingredients which enter into their product, which is sold as oleomargarine, and that is the best substitute for butter.

The French Government not long ago sent a commission down into Holland to inquire there into what had been the effect of the oleomargarine or butterine factories established in the low countries. What was the report? They were told that the establishment of these manufactories, which are sending their product all over the globe with perfect satisfaction to everybody concerned, had largely increased the raising of cattle, that the production of milk had enormously increased, and that those factories there were one of the means of support for a large number of people who raised cattle.

There are other things in the cow besides milk. Some people want to eat beef, some people want leather, some want bones, some want horns and hoofs, for every part of the animal is useful, even the hair. We talk about it as though the milk of the cow was the sole thing to be protected. What is to become of those vast ranges in the West, which are fast being extinguished, I am sorry to say? At last we have got to get back to the Eastern section of the country and the Middle section of the country to raise beef and butter, too. Who is going to discourage the raising of cattle merely because there is obtained from them this fat, this stearin—I believe it is called—I will ask the Senator from Idaho about that?

Mr. HEITFELD. Caul fat.

Mr. MONEY. I am not as familiar with this matter as some other Senators. These form an important article of the beef. The Cattle Association and the Live Stock Association, who met at Fort Worth, Tex., the State of my distinguished friend here [Mr. CULBERSON], and another at Chicago, declared that this bill would depreciate the value of their product from $3 to $4 per head of cattle. I do not know whether that is true or not, but that is what they say; it is in their memorial to Congress. They state that it is the truth. Those men are responsible; they are men of worth, and they state it positively.

There has been a great deal of talk about cotton-seed oil, and it is supposed that I am interested because my people raise cotton. That is not of such great concern to me, because the cotton trust regulates the price. I am going to be very honest about it and very candid. I am a cotton raiser, but I do not know that it is worth one cent to me, because if I sell my cotton seed at all I sell it at whatever price is imposed by the mill, and not by the state of the market for the seed or for the oil. But at any rate the farmers of the South are interested this much, that they want an avenue for every possible use of their product. In my opinion, having been a cotton raiser all my life, I think the best use to which a cotton farmer can put his cotton seed is to put it right back into the ground, and not let a mill touch it. It will pay more to the cotton planter in that way.

But, unfortunately, under the taxation that rests upon the cotton planter of the South to pay every sort of taxation to support the Government, to help to pay his share of the $140,000,000 of pensions, and his share of this, that, and other things, none of which he gets back, he has been compelled, by this narrow stress of circumstances—res angusta domi—to sell everything that will bring a price in the market, even if it results in detriment to his best interests. He ought to put his cotton seed right back to the earth that gave it to him, and not let the mill have it; but the cotton farmers do sell it, nevertheless. They are interested in it that much.

Prof. Henry E. Alvord, formerly of the Massachusetts Agricultural College and president of the Maryland College of Agriculture, and now Chief of the Dairy Division of the United States Department of Agriculture and one of the best butter makers in the country, says:

The great bulk of butterine and its kindred products is as wholesome, cleaner, and in many respects better than the low grades of butter of which so much reaches the market.

Then Prof. Paul Schweitzer, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry, Missouri State University, says:

As a result of my examination, made both with the microscope and the delicate chemical tests applicable to such cases, I pronounce butterine to be wholly and unequivocally free from any deleterious or in the least objectionable substances. Carefully made physiological experiments reveal no difference whatever in the palatability and digestibility between butterine and butter.

Now, if these things are true—and no man here can contradict them—what is the harm if a man intending to buy butter shall buy butterine by fraudulent imposition of his dealer? Of course we do not want fraud; but I think the fraud perpetrated is very little when you consider the vast amount of this substance that is sold. But is anybody injured by it? There is not the slightest injury in any sense of the word, but there is a relief to the pocket. Here one by one the so-called quasi reasons for the support of this bill perish when put to the test of truth.

Professor Wiley, Chief of the Division of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, also appeared before the committee and testified to the nutritive and wholesome qualities of oleomargarine.

Dr. George M. Kober, professor of hygiene, Georgetown University, District of Columbia, says:

As a teacher of hygiene, I have urged upon my students for years to bring the merits and nutritive value of this food stuff to the attention of the public, and in the interest of the wage-earners of this country to correct, as far as possible, the prejudice which has been created against the use of this product, provided always it is sold under its true name and at its real value. In this opinion I am glad to be supported by the highest scientific authorities in this country and abroad.

That brings me to this point: I have had it stated to me—I do not know whether it is true or not, and therefore I give it as I got it—that butterine and oleomargarine are used in nearly all the schools, colleges, and Soldiers' Homes in the United States, as well as by miners and working people, used with full and deliberate knowledge of what it is, and that it is bought and used as butterine and oleomargarine by preference by the one on account of its equal value with butter and by the other on account of its lower price. That may be disputed, and I am not able to substantiate it; but I say that statement has been made to me, and I believe it is true, or I would not repeat it.

Charles Harrington, assistant professor of hygiene in the medical school of Harvard University, in his Manual of Practical Hygiene, 1901, page 112, says:

Oleomargarine has been misrepresented to the public to a greater extent probably, than any other article of food. From the time of its first appearance in the market as a competitor of butter there has been a constant attempt to create and foster a prejudice against it as an unwholesome article made from unclean refuse of various kinds, a vehicle for disease germs, and a disseminator of tapeworms and other unwholesome parasites. It has been said to be made from soap grease, from the carcasses of animals dead of disease, from grease extracted from sewer sludge, and from a variety of other articles equally unadapted to its manufacture.

The truth concerning oleomargarine is that it is made only from the cleanest materials in the cleanest possible manner, that it is quite as wholesome as butter, and that when sold for what it is and at its proper price it brings into the dietary of those who can not afford the better grades of butter an important fat food much superior in flavor and keeping property to the cheaper grades of butter, which bring a better price. Oleomargarine can not be made from rancid fat, and in its manufacture great care must be exercised to exclude any material however slightly tainted.

These are the certificates of scientists who are not interested in this question pecuniarily and not interested except as scientists, who, by microscopic and chemical tests, ascertain whether this product is good or bad, to denounce it to the public if it is bad and to commend it if it is good. These experiments were instituted in the interest of the people who consume, not of the people who get money for the article manufactured, whether butter or butterine. All this testimony is in behalf of the people of the United States, the poor people.

Judge Hughes, of the Federal court of Virginia, in an opinion says:

It is a fact of common knowledge that oleomargarine has been subjected to the severest scientific scrutiny and has been adopted by every leading government in Europe as well as America for use by their armies and navies.

Now, will gentlemen please listen to that? Here is this statement of a Federal judge giving a decision from the bench that this article of oleomargarine is used by all the governments of the world in their armies and their navies, where the most nutritious and most wholesome food is absolutely necessary for the effective employment of their troops.

The great Napoleon never said a truer thing in his life than when he said an army was like a snake; it crawled upon its stomach; and if it was not well fed it was inefficient. And yet these governments, by the aid of their scientists and experts, have decided that oleomargarine is the best thing that they can give to the men in their armies and navies—better than butter, for it is just as wholesome and keeps in tropical countries better than butter.

Of course, it is next to impossible to keep butter from the milk of the cow in the Tropics. The Swiss have been in the habit of putting up their butter in wide mouth glass bottles, pouring on top of the butter two or three tablespoonfuls of the finest olive oil, which hermetically seals the butter, because nothing can get through the oil to it. In that manner of packing it has gone around the globe and been approved everywhere. It may be excelled by the Danish butter, I will say, which is the best butter made, which keeps better, is more easily preserved anywhere in the world, and is the best butter on earth, better even than Vermont butter. [Laughter.]

Judge Hughes went on to say, further:

Though not originally invented by us, it is a gift of American enterprise and progressive invention to the world. It has become one of the conspicuous articles of interstate commerce and furnishes a large income to the General Government annually.

We do not care anything about revenue, although this bill proposes to be a revenue bill.

Now, gentlemen, oleomargarine has come here to stay. You can repress it, but I want to tell you that the world's progress is made up of innovations, of inventions, of discoveries; and whenever a man can come forward with an article just as good as the one in use or better or cheaper the cheaper will prevail. You can not imitate the brand so as to prevent the world from finding out what it has bought. England attempted it and did utter forgeries upon the brands of our cotton goods sent to the Orient, and put in sizing to give the goods weight, but the Chinese detected the fraud, and it was a failure. Talk about the trade following the flag or anything else. Trade goes where it can buy the cheapest, the article being just as useful or as good, and you can not prevent it.

You can not put down this article. It has come to stay, and all the bills in the world will not prevent it. They will make it white, and the people will eat it white, perhaps, after the taste is educated, and I believe hotel men in New York are trying to cultivate the palate to white butter.

There is any amount of this matter here, but I do not care to read it all. What I have presented seems to me sufficient. As Mercutio said when he was wounded in a conflict between the Capulets and the Montagues and he lost his life—

'Tis not so deep as a well nor so wide as a church door, but 'tis enough; 'twill serve.

What I have submitted ought to convince, if it does not, and I believe it will. Here is something from the National Live Stock Association, but I will not read it.

Mr. President, I have talked longer on this subject than I expected, led on by interruptions which were very agreeable to me, because what I want is to bring out the truth of this matter. I have no prejudice against anything—butter or butterine—so far as that is concerned. But I insist upon some measure of justice being meted out to these people who can not be represented here on account of their poverty, except when they make up a purse and send a delegate, and in every instance where a single one has come here, sent by the laboring people, he has protested in the strongest possible language against the passage of this bill. He has denounced it as unjust, as robbing the people of a valuable food product, which can not be replaced by butter on account of its price.

You have heard here the protests of the people whose interests are concerned not as consumers, but as producers of articles going into the manufacture of this article of butterine. Then you have heard above all others the persistent cry of the dairyman, who wants this protection, although he is now protected with a 6 cents tax, protected by having the home market, protected by having a price higher from 6 to 9 cents than is found in any other market in the world. You have him here insisting upon this legislation, committing an outrage upon the poor, discriminating against the producers of certain substances, and absolutely attempting to tax out of existence a lawful industry producing a wholesome and nutritious article of food, with the admission from the chief, the head of the dairymen, that if this bill is not sufficient to extinguish that industry next winter will see him return with a bill that will. I suppose he will be here if this is not sufficient. I suppose that industry is writing with a large hand into the laws of this country what its demands are. Having no respect for anybody else's rights, and only concerned about their own interests, they have presented to the Senate and to the Congress a bill objectionable in every single one of its features, as I conceive it.

Of course there may be honest differences, but I think the bill is unconstitutional. I think it is unjust. I think it is oppressive to the poor, and I think it is immoral and dishonest. Whatever the courts may do about it matters not to me, discussing it on principle; but I say that if this measure were presented to the Supreme Court of the United States with a title that belongs to it by virtue of the inherent qualities of the bill itself, if there were prefixed to it a title which the reading of the bill would suggest to any fair-minded and candid man, the court would knock it out without a moment's hesitation as an unconstitutional measure. A shield has two sides, gold and silver; and sometimes a man fights until he gets around on both sides of the shield and sees both ways. I see it just as I think it is, without prejudice against anybody, without being particularly interested in it except, as I said, on account of the multitude of those who must have this kind of food—either butter, butterine, oleomargarine, or lard, or something of the kind—and who have appealed to us not for their protection against the retail dealer in oleomargarine, but for protection from this bill in your hands.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I desire to be heard briefly on this bill, and I am disinclined to proceed to-night. If it is not disagreeable to the Senate, I give notice that to-morrow when the unfinished business is taken up I will ask the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed—

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; but if some other Senator wishes to speak to-night, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, it has been charged here that the purpose of this bill is to destroy an established industry. I deny it. The enactment of the bill into law will put oleomargarine and kindred products before the people on their merits, for what they really are, and deprive the manufacturers of these products of the privilege of imposing them upon the public for what they are not.

The purpose of the bill is to prevent one class of manufacturers from enhancing the value of their product by making it to resemble another and more costly product. It will be difficult to convince any unprejudiced person that this is an immoral purpose or that it is a dishonest purpose.

When this question is looked at in its true light it is surprising that there should be any objections to the principles of this bill, because it is simply aimed at manifest intentional deception, shown in every feature of the article oleomargarine and the methods which are employed in its sale.

Not only is this article oleomargarine an intentional imitation of an older and more popular article of food in every possible detail, but the methods used to push its sale are equally deceitful. The names used to designate the compound, "Jersey creamery," "Holstein," "Fancy dairy," "Fancy creamery," etc., are all intended to mislead the public into believing it is another and more popular article of food, and added to this prima facie evidence of an intent to mislead the public comes the overwhelming testimony of the methods employed by those who deal in the article.

The makers and apologists for this imitation claim for it merit surpassing that of butter. They lay claim to better keeping quality, purer ingredients, more sanitary methods of production and a less susceptibility to its carrying disease germs. They argue that it is a popular article of food; that those who use it prefer it to butter, and that it is sold at prices much below those at which butter can be produced and sold. They tell us that as a matter of fact the two articles are chemically the same—butter and oleomargarine—and that one is as digestible as the other, and their product more pleasing to the palate than nine-tenths of the butter made.

Now, one would naturally suppose that the makers of an article possessing all these superior qualities would desire to have it stand absolutely on its own merits. It is customary with the producers of a popular article of food to copyright a trade-mark that will become familiar to the public, and to prominently display it upon the packages of their product. One or two soaps are advertised as possessing certain characteristics, such as being in powder form. Another is identified through the constant calling to the attention of the public the fact that "It floats."

What has been the history of oleomargarine? As to the article itself the very first quality, to accept the statements and claims of the makers, must be that it imitates butter. Unless it imitates butter, they say, it can not be sold. If butter were all white, they admit, their product could also be sold white. But all its other superior qualities count for naught when it is not possible to make it look like butter. The price, sometimes 50 per cent cheaper than butter, has no attraction to the buyer if the article does not look like butter. The advantages claimed of being more uniform in quality, more wholesome, fully as healthful, and imitating the taste of butter so completely as to fool experts, will not commend it to the people unless the eye is also deceived.

Now, the public might take some stock in this claim if it were made under other circumstances than presented. If the makers could show that the product oleomargarine was really desired by the public at large, and that the people knew it whenever they tasted it, and that there was no deceit in its sale, then their arguments for the right to color their product in semblance of butter would not meet objections. But what are the facts in the case?

The evidence before the committee of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine is overwhelming. It is the testimony of the food commissioners, presidents and secretaries of the State boards of agriculture, and others who have the matter of enforcing State laws in charge, that instead of the selling of oleomargarine for what it is being the rule, it is the exception. Our own senses and reason will make it plain to us that oleomargarine is almost wholly consumed as butter, when it is understood that fully one-ninth of all the articles marketed and consumed and supposed to be butter is oleomargarine. That is to say, the production of oleomargarine in this country last year was 104,000,000 pounds. It would fill over 5,000 cars of 20,000 pounds each. It would make a train 36 miles long. The production of butter was, as shown by the Twelfth Census, about 1,500,000,000 pounds, and it is estimated that about 700,000,000 pounds of this was consumed by the producer, leaving 800,000,000 pounds of butter to come upon the market, which meets in competition in the leading centers 104,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine. Now, it is well known that a very large majority of the hotels and eating houses serve oleomargarine on their tables. In fact, this is a large part of the trade of these manufacturers. Yet who of you ever remembers of knowingly consuming oleomargarine at a hotel or restaurant?

And who of you have ever called for it or heard anybody else call for it?

Where is the necessity for more evidence of deceit? This article has been on the market in the United States now for about a quarter of a century. It shows no more disposition to-day to stand on its own merits than it did twenty-five years ago. As a matter of fact, the attempt to popularize oleomargarine as such has not been successful.

The tax proposed in this measure is not intended to destroy the oleomargarine industry. The advocates of this bill have shown their willingness to be fair by conceding a reduction amounting to 87½ per cent of the present tax, when the article is made in its natural color, or, in fact, any color except that by which butter has been known from time immemorial. All they ask of Congress is to do what it can to aid the States in controlling the traffic of the colored article.

The opponents of the bill came before the Agricultural Committee and solemnly protested against what they termed vicious class legislation, which would deprive them of the right to color their oleomargarine in imitation of butter.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to know whether it would not suit the convenience of the Senator from North Dakota to go on in the morning; and if so, I will move an executive session.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is immaterial to me. I can finish what I have to say in the morning in a very short time, if it will accommodate the Senator. I yield.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 26, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 25, 1902.

POSTMASTER.

John F. Keller, to be postmaster at Romney, in the county of Hampshire and State of West Virginia, in place of Mary Gibson. Incumbent's commission expired February 18, 1902.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Commander Frederick M. Symonds, to be a captain in the Navy from the 16th day of March, 1902, vice Capt. A. S. Crowninshield, promoted.

Lieut. (Junior Grade) Hutch I. Cone, to be a lieutenant in the Navy from the 9th day of February, 1902, vice Lieut. John B. Bernadou, promoted.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

Infantry Arm.

Archibald G. Hutchinson, of Missouri, to be second lieutenant, February 2, 1901.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn March 25, 1902.

John Keller, to be postmaster at Romney, in the State of West Virginia.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 25, 1902.

POSTMASTERS.

William P. Fleming, to be postmaster at Georgetown, in the county of Williamson and State of Texas.

William F. Bloebaum, to be postmaster at St. Charles, in the county of St. Charles and State of Missouri.

William M. Treloar, to be postmaster at Mexico, in the county of Andrain and State of Missouri.

Joshua Mizell, to be postmaster at Punta Gorda, in the county of De Soto and State of Florida.

Sallie Millsaps, to be postmaster at Hazlehurst, in the county of Copiah and State of Mississippi.

Florence Sheasby, to be postmaster at Elgin, in the county of Bastrop and State of Texas.

James A. Gammill, to be postmaster at Calvert, in the county of Robertson and State of Texas.

Thomas T. Wilson, to be postmaster at Tarkio, in the county of Atchison and State of Missouri.

Charles T. Ramsdell, to be postmaster at Denton, in the county of Denton and State of Texas.

Harry Martin, to be postmaster at Bonham, in the county of Fannin and State of Texas.

Christian H. Wegerslev, to be postmaster at Alta, in the county of Buena Vista and State of Iowa.

John M. Glenn, to be postmaster at Sedalia, in the county of Pettis and State of Missouri.

Reuben N. Shanks, to be postmaster at Clarence, in the county of Shelby and State of Missouri.

Tom Richards, to be postmaster at Sherman, in the county of Grayson and State of Texas.

Warren S. Randall, to be postmaster at Poplar Bluff, in the county of Butler and State of Missouri.

Frank W. Reast, to be postmaster at Whitesboro, in the county of Grayson and State of Texas.

William C. Smith, to be postmaster at Bowie, in the county of Montague and State of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JOHN Y. COREY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10404) granting a pension to John Y. Corey, with Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—MOSS AGAINST RHEA.

The SPEAKER. This brings us to the election case of Moss against Rhea, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Rhea] is entitled to the floor for fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday afternoon when the hour of adjournment had arrived the time allotted to myself had been about half consumed. At the quitting point I had reached a precinct in the county of Logan that by the report of the committee itself, if dealt with in accordance with the rule of law as applied to the evidence in the case, would, in my judgment, be conclusive of this matter, and could only result in upturning the finding of the majority of the Committee on Elections. I believe that my contention is so well founded, touching at least two propositions submitted to the House on yesterday, that I will, at the expense of wearying, perhaps, those who heard me on yesterday, for the benefit of those who did not, recapitulate, as briefly as I may, what I said at that time. The contention of the contestee is: First, that the law controlling elections—that is, as to the method of voting, the returns to be made, and the statement necessary to accompany the returns—has not been complied with. Second, that if it be conceded that not only the spirit but the letter of the law has been fully met, and that the ballots returned with this record as contested are to be received as certain, as the true official ballots voted at the election in 1900 in the precincts in question in Warren County, an inspection of those ballots will demonstrate that a doubt must necessarily ensue in the minds of men as for whom these ballots were voted and how they should be counted, if at all.

It does not impute to the majority of this committee nor to any member of this House a partisan bias to say that his finding is in favor of the contestant, the Republican ticket; nor does it impute partisan bias to others to say that their finding is against that counting. But it goes alone to the different judgment men may form, the different impression which a personal inspection of these ballots may make. The ballots come in such a questionable shape—I speak now of their physical condition and not their legal status—that honest men may well differ about what they show or do not show; and I contend, further, that by every rule of law, whether it be written in the statute books of the much-defamed Kentucky or whether it is to be read in the text-books of the common-law writers, these doubts ought to be solved in favor of the sitting member, the contestee.

Now, to recapitulate for a few moments. It is admitted by those who make and defend the majority report that unless every ballot contained in the poll book at the precinct from which is returned the contested or rejected ballots—that each and every ballot that was in the book before the vote commenced must be accounted for or else that no value can be given to the returns sent up in shape of contested ballots, and no recount can be had.

Let us try that statement now in the light of the majority report of this committee. The very first precinct in the city of Bowling Green, county of Warren, that is under consideration by the report of this committee is Electric Light precinct, No. 20, and here is the return as made in the report of the committee:

Number of ballots counted as valid.....	264
Number of ballots questioned or rejected.....	100
Number of ballots marked "spoiled".....	10
Making a total sum of.....	374
Number of ballots cast.....	374
Number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed.....	0
Total number of ballots in this book.....	418

Mr. MANN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to mislead the gentleman in any way. In the actual record in the case the number of ballots not used and destroyed is given as blank.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. That is what I said. This is an exact copy of the record.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, in order not to mislead him: The Clerk of the House, in making up the printed record, or copy for the printed record, makes various marks on all papers indicating whether it is to be in one kind of type or another, and various things of that sort. As it is printed in the printed record there is a cipher used, which through mere inadvertence on my part is also copied into the majority report. In the certified copy of the record there is no cipher used at all.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. What is used?

Mr. MANN. It is a mere blank.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. A blank is a cipher and a cipher is a blank, as far as this goes.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to argue it; I simply called the gentleman's attention to it so that it would not mislead him.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. That does not mislead me at all. I submit, What would be the difference if, in stating the "whole number of ballots cast, 374, the number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed," there should be a blank there or a cipher? A blank means nothing; a cipher means nothing. Supposing it to be the fact that by reason of a mere typographical error a cipher has been placed there when there ought to be a blank, there are still 44 ballots unaccounted for that were sent to that polling place. If that is not true, then I ask the gentleman, before I take my seat, to show me wherein the error of the statement lies.

Therefore let us wipe out that cipher, and in that line, "Number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed, 0," let us put a blank instead of the cipher. Still the whole number of ballots accounted for is 374. The total number of ballots contained in that box when the election officers got it that morning was 418, and there are 44 ballots unaccounted for. Yet the majority of the committee say that out of 100 ballots returned as questioned or rejected sixty-odd ought to be counted for the contestant—three times as many as the majority of the committee gives him in its conclusion, notwithstanding the fact that the return shows that 44 ballots are missing and totally unexplained.

As I said yesterday, the committee may not be able to explain this, but the reading of this record will give the explanation. Turn to the deposition in the record of John E. Dubose, lawyer and witness for the contestant. He discloses, on cross-examination, that, contrary to the law, not only the Goebel law of Kentucky, but contrary to every statute in every State where the Australian ballot is used, the secrecy of the ballot law was destroyed, and the county clerk, the custodian of these ballots—the partisan of the contestant—permitted the contestant and his attorney to handle these ballots, and that the public generally had access to them for many days before they reached this committee or this House. If that is to be denied, I will read the statement of this witness of the contestant in which he discloses that fact.

A MEMBER. Is Dubose a Democrat or a Republican?

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. He was one of the "ex's;" and I may say, digressing from the record, one who did me a foul wrong as a Democrat and was denounced, and he and many of his kind have been driven out of the party. It was not a voluntary exile that he took. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was the conventions of my own party that refused to recognize him, and he found shelter in the camp of the Republicans of Kentucky.

Now, let us see what the law is. I do not read from a Kentucky decision, but from Illinois Reports, volume 94—the case of Kingerly v. Berry. That was a case growing out of a township election in which I believe some 7 or 8 or 10—I do not pretend to give the exact number; the principle is what I want to state—in which a number of ballots were contested, the contestee alleging that a recount of the ballots would disclose the fact that he had been fairly elected. Proof was made that the ballots there were to be kept secret and only surrendered into the possession of a court of competent jurisdiction to decide the contest, but that the clerk, the custodian of the ballots, had permitted the contestant himself to have them in his possession; and the court refused to consider them as evidence, saying that it was not necessary to show by evidence that actual fraud had been committed or that the ballots had been manipulated, but that the mere possession of them, the mere handling by the contestant, without notice to the contestee or without him or his friends being there to see what was being done, was sufficient to throw about them such suspicion as to warrant the court in utterly refusing them. That case has been affirmed and reaffirmed by later decisions in Illinois.

So that by every rule of law these 100 ballots coming from Electric Light precinct—waiving all questions of proper identification—are surrounded with such an aroma of fraud, and the chance to substitute other than the ballots originally sent up, that by every rule of right and justice and by every rule of law delivered by any court, they ought not be considered in this contest. The record shows that the clerk, the partisan of contestant, allowed contestant and his attorney to have possession of these 100 contested ballots; that 44 ballots not used in the election at this precinct are unaccounted for, and could easily have been marked and substituted for that number of the contested ballots actually returned by the election officers.

Next the record shows that out of six precincts in the county of Warren, whence 95 per cent—yea, I will say 99 per cent—of the contested ballots come, the Republicans had the sheriff of election in four of those precincts; that under the law—the old law, the Goebel law, the amended law, under every law that ever existed in Kentucky—the sheriff of elections is the arbiter between disagreeing judges. If the judges disagree as to the right of a man to vote or as to the regularity of a ballot after it has been put into the box and has been taken out for count, the sheriff has the decisive vote and can say whether the vote can be received or not and whether the ballot shall be counted or not; and the fact is disclosed by this record—a fact no man will deny—that in four instances a Republican sheriff—not appointed by fraudulent means, for that charge is not made by the contestant himself; not weak-kneed, old, and feeble Republicans, but men of brawn and brain, men in vigorous manhood, loyal and intelligent, there on the scene, inspecting these ballots before the ink had grown dry—refused to count them as properly cast for Moss and sent them up as contested.

I then ask this House if it shall substitute its judgment, far removed from the scene of action, more than a year after the election, on a mere physical inspection or noninspection now of the ballots and upon the recollection of men who detailed or professed to detail what they saw, for the judgment of these men, one Democrat and one Republican sheriff, or a Republican judge and a Democratic judge and a Republican sheriff all agreeing? I ask if the judgment of these men is to be set aside and yours is to be substituted in place of it as to what the true intent or purpose of these ballots was? And again, we come now to the county of Logan. That is my own county. I want to say within the record, for I am not traveling out of the record, that I have had the honor to appear before the voters of Logan County six different times for office.

Until I became a candidate for Congress the Republican party never even so much as put up a man against me in Logan County, although it had carried the election years before and years after my candidacy, and in the three elections in which I have stood before that people as a candidate for Congress I have received under the old law in 1896, before Goebel ever wrote his infamous law, as it was denounced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOREING] yesterday, before he ever dreamed of putting it upon the statute books, I received the highest majority ever given to a Democrat since the civil war, with one exception, in Logan County, over Dr. Hunter, the Republican sitting member of this House at that time [applause], and although a contest was waged by him and withdrawn, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, a careful inspection of the record and the votes disclosed the fact that it was an honest vote I received there, uninfluenced by partisan election boards or officials. The record discloses it.

In 1895 the county of Logan went Republican, and it was so certified, giving Governor Bradley a majority of 288, I believe—over 200, at any rate. In 1896 it gave me a majority of 862. In 1897 it ran down to less than 100 Democratic majority in some of the county races. In 1898 it gave me 1,060 majority. In 1899 it went Republican, and in 1900 it gave me in round numbers a majority of 800, and I shall go back there, and if I stand as a candidate again an honest majority of at least 1,000 will be returned for this contestee. [Applause.] I do not ask the aid of Democratic returning boards or election commissions. I take my appeal to the honest people of that county, and it has ever, and I believe ever will, sustain me. [Applause.] Yet, notwithstanding these facts, the contestant devoted more time in his notice of contest to that county than to any other. It was there where, to use the language of the report, the contestant said that gross frauds were committed in all the precincts.

I want this House to bear in mind that there were no contested ballots came up from Logan County. There was a change of only 1 vote made in this record. There were not a dozen contested ballots sent up, as my recollection serves me now, or exceeding a dozen, from all over the county, but the contestant pitched his whole battle on the ground of fraud, thinking, no doubt, he would overslaugh me and the Democratic party. He ransacked with a fine-tooth comb from center to the outermost edge of the county in every direction. He could not find, except within three precincts any testimony that even squinted at any wrongdoing. He particularly assailed one large Democratic precinct, Ferguson, No. 20, saying that here in this precinct particularly a common conspiracy had been laid between the election commissioners, the Democratic management, and the officials who were to preside at the polling place there on election day, and what did he discover? He discovered that the clerk of the elections, a Democrat, with the assistance of the Republican inspector, got drunk during the voting hour.

That his conduct was very reprehensible I admit. The drunkenness was reprehensible, and in his drunken condition he slammed votes this way and the other way. He perhaps refused to put 6 or 8 or 10 votes, I do not know the exact number, but not very many, in the ballot box which the contestant alleges were entitled to go there, but the proof shows that the other Democratic officials tried to get him to leave his place as clerk on account of his drunken condition and let somebody else assume the duties there, and the report goes on in this language:

This charge of conspiracy to commit fraud relates to a number of precincts in Logan County. It is quite certain that the Kentucky law requiring an equal division of the precinct election officers between opposing political parties was neither properly nor honestly obeyed by the county election board in Logan County. It is also quite certain that in a number of the precincts the conduct of the officers of election is subject to criticism. For instance, in Ferguson precinct the Democratic clerk of election conducted himself in a particularly reprehensible manner.

So, too, say I. He conducted himself in a particularly reprehensible manner, but the committee do not, in that candor which I submit should have characterized the criticism of this precinct, relate what the evidence discloses, that he was in a drunken condition and that that accounted for his reprehensible conduct. The report continues:

It is charged that in this precinct a number of persons who voted the Republican ticket made out the proper affidavits in accordance with the statute after being challenged, but that nevertheless their ballots were not counted, and that the officers of the election conducted the election without regard to the law and wholly in the interest of the contestee and against the interest of the contestant.

The certificate of return by the election officers in this precinct of itself at least casts suspicion on, if it does not condemn the action of, the election officials in the precinct.

They made the following return—

Bear in mind this is a return that comes from a large Democratic precinct, admittedly so, made by Democratic officials—

Number of ballots counted as valid .....	245
Number of ballots questioned or rejected .....
Number of ballots marked "spoiled" .....

Whole number of ballots cast .....	21
Number of ballots not used and destroyed after the polls closed .....	96

Total number of ballots in this book .....	300

FOR CONGRESS.

John S. Rhea received .....	Votes.
J. McKenzie Moss received .....	168
	85

The report goes on:

It will be seen from this that the number of ballots counted as valid is less than the combined vote returned for Rhea and Moss; that the whole number of ballots cast is incorrectly stated; that there is no return of questioned or rejected or spoiled ballots, and that the whole return is inaccurate and insufficient.

So say I, and I submit to this House and to that honorable committee, if the whole return was insufficient and inaccurate, why did you not set it aside in whole? Why did you not wipe out the 168 votes returned for me and the 85 votes returned for Moss, and then put us to the law which is laid down by McCrary, the ablest law writer on contested elections whom I know?

He says that where the verity of a return is destroyed, or where it comes in such questionable shape that it can not be received, or where fraud lurks round about the action of the election officers and destroys the value of returns, that both parties to the record can yet put the legal voters on the stand and show that they were there present at the polling place and cast their votes, and their votes so proved shall be given to the man for whom they were cast. Recognizing that that return had been impeached, as I now disclaim by intentional fraud, because it was my friend destroying a large vote for me: he did it, and whether technical or actual fraud, the fraud existed. We recognized that the return had been destroyed. And out of the 168 votes certified for me I have accounted, by the sworn testimony in this record, for 144 of them, leaving only 24 not shown to have been absolutely cast there. One hundred and forty-four men proven to have voted that day, proven to have been legal voters that day, proven to have cast their vote for me on that day; but as I said yesterday, commenting on Dubose, lawyer and witness, that he was not much to be feared as a lawyer, but dangerous as a witness. He never knew that in destroying that return he destroyed the 85 votes certified for Moss, the contestant; or else, following the language of his written brief before the committee, he assumed that no proof was necessary in order to have a Democrat unseated by this House.

I will read his language:

There is a ray of comfort for a contestant who was a candidate of the Republican party in this: That he does not have to take proof to explain irregularities or disprove charges of fraud; the law relieves him of this duty.

It is a direct insult to the committee and the House. He never put a witness on the stand to prove that Moss had received, or that Glenn, the other candidate for Congress, had received a vote.

What do the committee finally say about it? They say:

We have, however, in this, as in other instances, resolved all doubts in favor of the contestee, and hence do not change the vote as returned in this precinct.

You say it is smirched with fraud; you say it is irregular; you say it is uncertain; you say it is incorrect; you say the conduct of the election clerk was most reprehensible; you say nothing can be proven from it; but in your kindness of heart you resolve all doubts in my favor, and let both the 168 for me and the 85 for Moss stand, and, forsooth, why? The result, not the motive—for I do not impugn the motive—what would have been the result had you thrown out that which you yourself have spat upon in your report and denounced? Had you thrown out the 85 votes certified, in the absence of Moss proving, as I have proved, and as I was compelled to prove to get credit for the vote there, the 85 would have four times wiped out the 21 majority you return for him and have left me the undisputed rightful occupant of a seat on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the result, explain it as you may or as you can. No other result follows that action, that conclusion, that determination.

As to the general charge and intimation of a dishonest administration of the election law in the appointment of election officials for the Republicans in Logan County by the Democratic members of the commission, I shall not take the time to read the record; but I call the attention of the gentleman who will conclude this case to the evidence of Mr. L. A. Freeman, the Republican election commissioner; not a blind, halt, decrepit, ignorant, disloyal Republican, but, I assert on my honor as a man, he was the choice of the Republican county committee for that place and was recommended to the State commission and appointed as the choice of the Republicans of that county. And the evidence here discloses the fact that the commissioner appointed Democratic officials only when he was unable to give the names of Republicans competent to fill the election places in about four election precincts in Logan County, and in some he himself suggested the Democrats, because no Republicans lived within the district of the intelligence that he admitted the law required they should have if appointed to those places.

And I submit, further, that the proof shows, notwithstanding the denunciation of the committee of that election board, that they did in many places appoint Republicans where Freeman recommended Democrats; and his evidence admits that. Take the Court-House precinct, in Russellville. He did not name a Republican, although many reside there, but he named Democrats. These simon-pure Democrats, those who are better than their party—Buckner and Palmer, John Brown, anti-Goebel—and I take the responsibility to say I advised the two Democratic members not to appoint Democrats, but to find Republicans, because the law then said that an equal division should be had if they could be found. I did not suggest the names, but told them to appoint Republicans in every precinct where they could find them intelligent enough to fill the place, and the record shows that in the Court-House precinct they did appoint Republicans, instead of so-called Democrats suggested by the Republican commissioner.

Complaint is now made that the commission did not appoint certain Republicans; for instance, that John Sadler and Foster were appointed instead of Burger and somebody else. Nobody ever proposed Burger or the other men. The commission selected Republicans who could read and write, and whose loyalty to their party was and is unquestioned to this day, and put them at the polling places. In four precincts Freeman himself admits not a Republican resided, because not a white man in those precincts has ever united as yet with the Republican party; where Freeman himself admits no Republican who could read or write or intelligently administer the law and protect the interests of the Republican party could be found. Therefore he says he made no recommendations except those of Democrats, and that in those places, with possibly the exception of one, the Democrats he suggested were appointed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to come to Allen County. I want to show you another thing. You will find on page 233 of the record evidence that at a polling place in Scottsville, Allen County, Ky., John H. Gilliam, a Republican, not a voter of that precinct, went into the polling place and got from the Republican clerk 50 ballots, not voted at that polling place, but sent them somewhere else, so they say. That Republican clerk of elections, at the request of J. H. Gilliam, a Republican, tore out, in violation of the statute law of the State, 50 ballots from that polling book and took them outside of the polling place. Now they attempt to explain that by saying that they had run short at ——— precinct, or some other precinct, and they took the official ballots from one polling place and sent them to another.

Talk about committing a fraud. Give me one of the official ballots outside of the polling place and if I am dishonest and partisan enough to violate the law I can change the result of two-thirds of the votes polled there if I could find men who would sell their votes, by marking one official ballot for a Democratic candidate, give it to the voter and say: "Take this into the polling booth, put this marked ballot into the box, and bring me one out when the clerk gives it to you, unstamped; bring it to me and I will pay you the money." When he does that I can take it and mark it and give it to another corrupt voter and repeat the process. Here is evidence that this was done, done by a Republican clerk at the instance of a Republican worker. The explanation of this was that they wanted them to go to some other precinct. When they arrived there it was found that only 11 of these were used, and they further say that out of 11, 6 or 7 were voted by Democrats and 3 or 4 were voted by Republicans. How do they know how these ballots were voted? This was unlawful, and gave the opportunity to the Republicans who got the ballots to commit fraud and bribe voters.

Then you take Butler County, the home of Taylor, the refugee governor. Take that, and I have the returns of elections for eight or ten years in the record. Yet it seems that with the result in that county for eight or ten years, that at the November election, without any increase in the Democratic votes, the Republican votes stated in these returns runs up to 97 per cent of the total vote of Butler County, something that never occurred in the history of the United States in any county in any State of the Union. Yet the committee, with all these things staring them in the face, because they say they can determine better than the election officers, both Democrats and Republicans, how a smeared or blurred ballot was intended to be voted, determined to give contestant 21 majority on the recount, and this House is asked to declare that the seal of my State certifies to a lie and a fraud.

Do it, gentlemen, if it be your judgment; I shall not complain. I stand here for my people and my party, thank God, as I have ever stood. Never in the hour of my greatest extremity, political or otherwise, have I been found to befool the people of my own State, Democrats or Republicans. [Applause.] I would scorn to do it. I stand for Kentucky and Kentuckians, Kentucky manhood and womanhood, for the honesty of her election officials, for the honesty of her voters, and for the virtue of her women, thank God. [Applause.] Not for a seat on this floor, not for the Presidency of this great nation, could I be induced to befool the State that has honored me with an election in this body. [Applause.]

Now, about the contestant; let me read you something from his printed brief in this case. He says:

In 1899 Mr. Taylor carried the district by 1,500 majority over Mr. Goebel, with 1,500 votes cast for Mr. John Young Brown. This change in the political complexion of the district was due in a large measure to the zeal and ability of Mr. J. McKenzie Moss, he having been selected by the anti-Goebel Democrats to manage their campaign. He gave his whole time to the work without compensation or expectation of reward. Because of this and his fitness for the place—

He tells you this, and it must be true [laughter on the Democratic side]—

Because of this and his fitness for the place, and because he was and is in full accord with the Republican party on the dominant issues of the time, he was unanimously nominated as the candidate of the Republican party from this district.

That is a little bit of history that I never knew. I did my best to get the contestant to occupy this floor and tell his tale to this House. I invited him—whether that invitation was delivered or not I do not know—through my friend Judge SMITH of Iowa, with the assurance that he should speak without objection on my part or the objection of my associate Democrats. I sent my colleague, Mr. WHEELER, in person to him, and he declined. I wanted him on this floor, and he might have chosen his place, but I wanted him where he would have the right to speak and to answer questions. I wanted him to tell if he is in full accord with the Republican party on all the dominant issues of the day, when and how he got there.

This record discloses the fact that within less than two weeks before the election he registered as a Democrat in the city of Bowling Green. Now, either that registration given in by him is false or his statement in his brief is false. I care not which. I assert, too, and if he is fortunate enough to get his seat here and will dare deny it, I will send to some member the sworn evidence of his own adherents, the Brown Democrats, that he told them, not later than a week before the election, that he was for Bryan and free silver, and if elected to this House he would vote with the Democrats on the organization and all party questions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will defy him, if he gets his seat, to deny it, and I will overwhelm him with evidence to demonstrate that he is the poor, miserable creature that I know him to be.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BOWIE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not take up the time of the gentleman from Kentucky, as he has only five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I can not help that; this is not parliamentary language.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Kentucky be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Speaker has not yet ruled.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I will wait until the Chair has ruled.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, we would like to have a ruling whether the gentleman is proceeding in order or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAHON). The Chair did not hear all of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House, and I suppose this would come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky or out of the time of the House, and I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, the statement that he betrayed his party, allied himself to the opposition without the hope or expectation of reward, is not the current history of his own city of Bowling Green, in the Third Congressional district. I undertake to say that there is sworn testimony that he registered as a Democrat. Three of his witnesses testified on cross-examination that he was known as a free-silver Democrat when he was making this run against me. I undertake to say, in the face of this record, that if current history is not true when it says he got his reward in that canvass he is now abjectly begging the Republican party in this House to take him, saying he is theirs to-day and to do their will from now henceforth, which shows that he hopes to come into his reward right soon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am about done. During my five years of service on the floor of this House I recall with pride and with pleasure that never has an unkind word or a discourteous retort escaped my lips to any member on either side of this Chamber. I have never indulged in acrimonious debate. I have never seen fit to impugn the motives of my brethren, whether differing or agreeing with me. I have not done so in this instance. But I am equally proud of the fact that the record discloses the fact that I have stood by my party platform and my party faith against all comers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And for that I have no apologies to make.

So long as I believe in its principles I stand ready on all merely party questions, questions of party or governmental policy, to follow my party. Whenever the time may come that I can not longer follow it, then, like an honest and conscientious man, as I hope I am, I will renounce that party and go openly to that party wherein I can find shelter and secure association with those in consonance with my opinions and views. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House, fellow-members, I make no cringing appeal to you. I do not want you to violate your sense of duty. If your honest judgment leads you to conclude that I am not rightfully the occupant of this seat, say so. But I do beg you, as honest men, if this contestant has not shown by proof positive and certain that the seat I hold does not belong to me, rise above party questions, even though you have to differ with your committee, and follow your judgment and give me the benefit of it.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for your courteous and kind attention. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the impassioned appeal of the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee in this case; and I must say that the eloquence he has displayed merits the congratulations which have been extended to him by gentlemen on the other side. That his appeal was impassioned is something for which nobody will criticize him, in view of the position which he occupies. But it becomes my duty, Mr. Speaker, to recall the attention of this House to the fact that the committee in this case have solved every doubt in favor of the contestee, and yet are bound to come to the conclusion that the contestant is lawfully entitled to his seat.

It is not to be forgotten in this case that the contestant proceeded in the election in Kentucky under great and grave disadvantages. The committee in this case had hoped, in view of the fact that there were enough ballots here to settle this controversy by a mere count, to be relieved of the necessity of going into the question of the Goebel election law—that fraud at the very source of elections in the State of Kentucky—as well as to be relieved of the necessity of going into the question of fraud at the election under that law. But since so much has been made of it, let me for a moment call the attention of the House to the Goebel election law.

That law provides, in the first place, that a partisan body shall be elected by the legislature, consisting of two Democrats and one Republican—not a Republican of Republican selection, but of Democratic selection. It provides that these three shall, in every county in the State, appoint an election board, of which the Democratic party has control—giving that party control in every county in the State. And that election board does what? It appoints election officers, and the law requires that the Republicans shall have representation among the election officers, but it does not require that they shall have representation of their own choice.

Under an election law of this sort, Mr. Speaker, this case discloses the fact that with the machinery in the possession of the Democratic party these election officers, acting under the Goebel election law, could certify to the contestee in this case a majority of only 158, and to do that it was necessary to refuse to count votes which it is plain to be seen by anybody should be counted for the entire Republican ticket. Some question has been raised in this case as to what the record discloses as to the manner in which these election officers in Kentucky were appointed.

The contestee himself eulogizes the character of L. A. Freeman, a Republican and a witness in this case—not, he says, a weak man. The contestee gives him credit for both character and intelligence. What says Mr. Freeman, who was the minority representative on the county board of election commissioners of one of the counties of the Third district?

Q. Of the 21 precincts, in which and how many of them were there no Republicans whom you could recommend?

A. I think there were three or four, probably.

Q. Of the 42 names submitted by you how many were appointed by the board?

A. There was some 14 or 15.

Again he says:

Q. What about J. T. Rhorer?

A. I knew him to be a Republican.

I am showing the House the character of the people they appoint in Kentucky to take care of the interests of the Republican party in the elections.

Q. Did he ask to be excused for any reason?

A. He made an affidavit that he was physically disqualified to serve.

Q. What attention was paid to his affidavit?

A. Rejected.

Q. Had he or not, on several occasions before, been appointed as an election officer and always failed to serve?

A. I could not say.

And then, gentlemen of the House, there follows a statement of his physical difficulties, which I shall not read; neither shall I read the promises made by the contestant's brother, a member of the board of county commissioners, to enable him to rid himself of his physical troubles. But I suggest to any member of this House who wishes to see the amusing side of this case that he read this part of the record.

And again. They appointed to take care of Republican interests in one of the precincts Dillard Foster; and about him the record shows the following questions and answers:

Did you ask him if he could read and write?

I don't know that I did at that time, but I did before the election, for he spoke to me about it on several occasions after my first talk with him.

Could he read or write, either?

He could not read the letters that I handed him, and his writing was very poor.

Was it anything more than a scrawl?

I could not read it.

And you could not read it after he had written it?

I don't think I could. He came around the next morning and told me he could write better now than he could the night before.

That is the character of people put up in elections to take care of the Republican party's interests in the State of Kentucky, and the kind of people selected by Democrats to represent the Republican party in this election in the Third Congressional district of that State, from which this contest comes.

Let me call the attention of the gentlemen of this House to another matter. Public opinion in the State of Kentucky, dissatisfied with the dishonesty of this election law, required its repeal, and the legislature of that State passed what was known as the emergency law of October 16, 1900. They, however, specifically excepted from the operation of that emergency law the Goebel election law concerning the appointment of election machinery, which was so unpopular in the State.

Let me ask gentlemen on the other side, who defend that law, why, if it was a just law, did popular opinion in Kentucky compel them to repeal it? And why, if they saw fit to repeal it, did they except the very part of it that was objectionable from operation at the election of 1900? Was it not, Mr. Speaker, for this purpose: In order that they might seem to yield to popular demand when they were compelled to; and yet that they might keep that law for one more election, and have one more chance to stifle public sentiment and the popular will in that district under the terms of that infamous Goebel election law?

Gentlemen on the other side have argued this case with great adroitness. They would have you believe that the committee in this case have resolved doubts in favor of the contestant. They tell you that as to these election precincts there is no evidence as to how many votes were rejected and how many were merely questioned. They have particularly called attention to Kister's Mill precinct, where 112 ballots were rejected.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] said that he did not know and nobody knew as to how many of these 112 ballots marked as questioned or rejected had been counted. But the record, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of this House, discloses what gentlemen on the other side were unwilling to know. The testimony of L. J. Warden, one of the election officers, on page 54 of the record, is as follows:

Q. Were any of these 112 ballots counted for anyone; and if so, for whom?
A. They were not counted for anyone.

And so you may take the evidence all through.

Now, the part of this case that is clearest and plainest, that part which is absolutely conclusive and yet does not attack anybody's conduct or character or reputation; that part upon which the committee sought to rest its case without going further and proving more than was necessary and much that is offensive, is as follows: In the last Kentucky election the ballot was composed of six tickets. The Democratic ticket was the first one on the left, and the Social Democratic ticket was the last one on the extreme right. The Republican ticket was the second one from the left, and the Socialist Labor ticket was the second one from the extreme right. So that when the ballots were folded the Democratic ticket folded over exactly on the Social Democratic ticket, and the Republican ticket folded over exactly on the Socialist Labor ticket.

The result was that using the stencil with a pad full of ink, when these tickets were folded the cross which had been put by the voter in the circle, as required by the Kentucky election law, made a blur over on the corresponding ticket on the other side. There are enough of these tickets in the record where the election officers in this district refused to count Republican tickets that had been blurred on an opposite ticket, after the voter marked for a straight Republican ticket, to change the result of this election. Upon a consideration of these tickets the committee has reported. And yet we are talked to as if something unkind were done to the contestee in this case. The ranking member of the committee, who introduced this discussion, referred, as he had a right to refer, to the record of this committee for fairness and judicial decision of these election cases.

I may refer to that record, Mr. Speaker, because it existed before I was a member of this body, much less of this committee. It is the record of this committee that it has never reported cases for decision to the House except in a judicial manner, putting partisanship and unfairness aside; and in this Congress of the two cases that we have reported, one has been in favor of the Democrat, and this one in favor of the Republican. I challenge the closest examination, Mr. Speaker, of the action of the committee in this case by every member of this House, and assert that it will sustain the reputation of the committee for fairness.

We are told again, Mr. Speaker, that we are deciding this case contrary to the decision of the supreme court of the State of Kentucky. Let us see what the decisions of the supreme court of Kentucky are which bear upon this case. The decision referred to by gentlemen on the other side is that of Anderson v. Likens. The court says in that case:

But it appears from an inspection of those ballots that none of them were accompanied with a true statement as to whether they had or had not been counted, and if counted, what part and for whom, as required by article 3, section 37.

There was no statement at all in relation to any of them except five or six, and the statement as to them was not only meager, but signed alone by the clerk of election, and not all of them signed by him officially. We think the statement should be full and complete, as required by the statute, and signed officially by all of the election officers.

Moreover, section 1476 seems to prohibit such a statement being made upon the ballot itself, as was done by the clerk in the case referred to. Consequently the statement, in order to carry with it verity, must be made on a separate paper, signed by all the officers of election, and its relation to the particular ballot it refers to must be clearly shown by attaching them together, or in some other satisfactory manner, and sealed up and returned to the clerk of the county court with the returns of the election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to claim, as gentlemen on the other side have claimed, that the Kentucky court of appeals intended to decide that a separate certificate must accompany each and every one of these ballots, and be attached in every case to the ballot, and that such certificate should state at length as to every office whether it had been voted and for whom, would be to convict the Kentucky court of appeals of requiring of election officers an utter impossibility.

Take the case of Kisters Mill precinct. There are 112 ballots not counted. If it be correct, as claimed by the contestee, that the election officers should prepare a certificate stating as to every ballot whether it was not counted for governor, not counted for lieutenant-governor, not counted for all the other officers in detail and by name, it is clear to every man that it would be impossible for the election officers to make a return inside of two or three days; and yet the statute of Kentucky requires, and very properly requires, that the counting of the ballots shall be concluded on the night after the election, or immediately after the election without any adjournment.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are not left in doubt as to whether this contention is true under the decisions of the supreme court of Kentucky, because the supreme court of Kentucky, in the case of Booe v. Kenner, decided since the decision in Anderson v. Likens, upon which the gentlemen on the other side rely, goes on to give a full review of the case of Anderson v. Likens. It will be seen by any gentleman who will take the trouble to refer to that case that the supreme court of Kentucky, in three different places in the decision, refers to the case of Anderson v. Likens.

The case I am speaking of (Booe v. Kenner) was not only a well-considered case, but was particularly well considered with reference to the case of Anderson v. Likens. In that case the judges say that they have carefully inspected the ballots, and that the same position for which we contend in this case—the right to inspect ballots certified as these—was correct and proper. Here are the ballots themselves [holding up to the view of the House the ballots which were before the Kentucky court of appeals in Booe v. Kenner] which the supreme court of Kentucky permitted to be counted, for the purpose of correcting a false return in that case, and gentlemen of the House would do well to examine these ballots and see how much on all fours they are with the ballots which we have counted in this case, and how much on all fours the decision of the committee in this case is with the decision of the Kentucky court of appeals in Booe v. Kenner.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman does not desire to misstate the record, I am sure. Was not the question in the Booe case a question of jurisdiction entirely, and did not the court so decide, that it had no jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The Booe case brought up this question, Mr. Speaker: Under the old Kentucky law they had had a viva voce vote, and the supreme court had decided that under that law the writ of mandamus would lie to compel a proper count and a particular certificate, because the election officers had nothing to do but foot up the returns. That mandamus would not lie under the recent law; but in view of the fact that the change of procedure was just then taking place in that case, in view of the fact that injustice was likely to be done to the person who had relied upon the course of decisions formerly sustained by the supreme court, that court went into the merits of the record, and permit me to read to the gentleman from Kentucky what they said:

It is insisted for appellee that he took his proceeding in this case relying upon the case of Houston v. Steele, and that after he has acted upon it this court can not in justice overrule that decision when to do so will be to defeat his action. In answer to this we will add that we have carefully examined the record and are satisfied that the decision of the county canvassing board in giving Dudley the certificate of election was right; that the intention of the voter can be determined from an inspection of several of the ballots rejected by the court below, and that on the merits of the case the mandamus should be denied.

Now, the county board of canvassers, in doing what the supreme court of Kentucky say was right, had done exactly what this committee has done in this case.

Where does this trouble come from? It comes from a misunderstanding with reference to section 47 of the election law of Kentucky, which provides what sort of certificate the election officers shall make as to ballots. In the first place, the Kentucky election law requires ballots to be furnished to election officers bound in a book. It requires the election officers to account for all those ballots, how many of them were voted, how many of them were counted as valid votes, how many of them were questioned or rejected, and the number which were destroyed. There is no other form of certificate set out in the Kentucky election law.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the position contended for by gentlemen on the other side were correct, what would have happened? In the first place, if these lengthy certificates were demanded by law the law itself would have required the public officers to furnish the election officers blanks with which to make them. The election officers are not usually lawyers; they are not usually men skillful with the pen; and even if they were the most skillful lawyers and most skillful penmen in the world, they could not within a reasonable time prepare 112 certificates of the character claimed to be necessary by gentlemen on the other side.

But not only is it true that the law does not make the requirement; it is likewise true that the election machinery of neither party in Kentucky has ever furnished such blanks to its election managers and workers, and if you will look at the language of the statute you will see why. Because the language itself in the certificate required by the election law would never indicate to anybody that any such certificate as claimed to be necessary by gentlemen upon the other side ought to be made. Now, election laws are like constitutions, in that they are intended for the guidance of the people themselves. They are intended to be construed by the rank and file of the people, from whom are taken election officers. When you look to the form of the certificate required by the statute to be made out by the election officers, what is it?

SEC. 1483. The form of the return to be made on the inside of the cover of the stub book shall be substantially as follows: State of Kentucky, ——— County, election held on the ——— day of ———, 18—, in ——— precinct. Number of ballots counted as valid, ———; number of ballots questioned or rejected, ———; number of ballots marked "spoiled," ———; whole number of ballots cast, ———; number of votes received for governor, ——— by ———; number of votes received for lieutenant-governor, ——— by ——— (and so for other State and county offices). * * * We, the judges, sheriff, and clerk of election at the precinct mentioned, certify that the above is a correct return of the election held therein on the day aforesaid * * *.

Now, let us remember that election laws are for the guidance of the people—the laymen—who as a general rule are in the first instance charged with their construction. The election officers are required to certify "the number of votes counted as valid" and "the number of votes questioned or rejected." Now let us see what they did at these various voting places in the Third district of Kentucky, so far as they appear in this record. Take Electric Light precinct, No. 20, as a sample, and it is a fair sample in this case, and I refer to this precinct because it has been the subject of very much discussion. The certificate is as follows:

Number of ballots counted as valid .....	264
Number of ballots questioned or rejected .....	100
Number of ballots marked "spoiled" .....	10

Whole number of ballots cast .....	374
------------------------------------	-----

Now, what, under the law, would the election officers understand to be a proper certificate? That they should certify that they counted the votes; that if they counted a vote they should certify it as "valid" and return it among the "valid" ballots, as required by the election laws of Kentucky; that if they thought certain ballots were not valid ballots, then they should not so certify them, but should certify and return them as "questioned" or "rejected" ballots. And, again, if "questioned" and "rejected" are terms that mean something different, how much or how little questioning will, under the contention of gentlemen on the other side, make it necessary for the election officers to take a valid ballot out of the list of "valid votes" and certify it as "questioned?" The absurdity is too apparent for argument. Such a view would put in the power of a single election officer to take all valid ballots or a precinct out of their proper class and have them certified as questioned or rejected. Such was obviously not the intention of the law.

The common-sense inference of the law, the one that ought to be drawn and the one which the record in this case shows that the election officers did draw, is that whenever they counted a ballot as valid they so certify it, and whenever they rejected a ballot they put that in the "questioned or rejected" envelope, and certify it accordingly. Yet we are told, Mr. Speaker, that for some reason or technicality we can not use our sense and judgment, that we can not make a proper calculation in this case; that where the election officers certify, as in this precinct, the number of "ballots counted as valid" 264, the number of ballots "questioned or rejected" 100, the whole number of ballots cast 374, we, for some reason or technicality, can not arrive at the necessary conclusion that 264 ballots were counted and 100 were rejected; that we can not make the simplest mathematical calculation; that we can not employ the plainest processes of reasoning and of common sense.

The contestee, Mr. Speaker, in his argument on yesterday afternoon undertook to attack the position of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], for having said in effect that while in many places where the Republican party had two election officers, by virtue of their law which made the sheriff the arbitrator in cases of dispute, the Democrats still had the control in the precincts. And with great vigor and denunciation he asserted that the gentleman from Iowa was ignorant of the law of the State of Kentucky in making that assertion.

Well, there was a slight inaccuracy in saying that the Democrats had the sheriffs in all cases. The contestee called attention to the Court-House precinct, the Electric Light precinct, and the Police Court precinct, three very important precincts in this case in which the Republicans had the sheriff. Let me see, Mr. Speaker, if that can not be explained. I read from section 1493 of the Kentucky statutes, as follows:

SEC. 1493. Duties of respective officers.—In making the registration the clerk shall act as the recording officer, the judges shall decide all questions relating to the qualifications of persons offering to be registered, except that in case of a difference of opinion between the judges the clerk shall have the casting vote.

Now, section 1487 provides that "The officers of election in the several election precincts of the respective cities and towns mentioned in the preceding section shall be the officers of registration in such precincts." So that it appears that in substance the gentleman from Iowa was correct, because under this election law the Democratic party had the sheriff in all those places where the sheriff was the most useful officer, and in the registration precincts they took the clerk because in such precincts he was the essential and important officer.

Mr. BOREING. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BOREING. In view of that, is it not a fact that the contestee himself is either ignorant of the law or unfair in his argument?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Well, Mr. Speaker, there has been so much talk on the other side about ignorance and about legal ability adapted only to a justice's court that I do not care to characterize the contestee as ignorant or as unfair. But I do state, however, in this case, that this record shows that wherever under the Kentucky election law the Democratic party needed a sheriff, they had the sheriff; and where the clerk would best suit their purposes, they had the clerk. So the gentleman from Iowa knew pretty well the Kentucky election law, and he appreciated accurately its practical working.

There is one other precinct to which the contestee himself called attention, and that I want to mention. It was Electric Light precinct No. 20, where he claims that the whole returns should be thrown out. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the committee had thrown out the whole return, as claimed by him, it would have reduced his majority 30; whereas by the course the committee took it only gave Mr. Moss a majority of 6. In other words, the contestant in this case would have been 24 votes worse off if the course had been adopted that the contestee contends the committee in fairness should have taken.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Did not the contestee say that under the law he had produced witnesses to prove that 145 of those ballots were deposited for him?

Mr. MANN. That related to another precinct, a precinct in Logan County, while Electric Light precinct is in Warren County.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. As to the precinct the gentleman from Missouri has just mentioned, what reason was there for throwing it out? It is in evidence in this case that the election officers failed to remove the secondary stub from certain ballots voted; and we are gravely told that because the election officers in that case did not do their duty the voters in that precinct should be disfranchised.

Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri, since the contestee is not present, that I hope there never will be a Congress that will decide that voters may be robbed of their rights because election officers fail to do a duty of that kind; and especially when, as in this case, it is shown that the tearing off of the stub afterwards, when the polls were closed, was done by agreement of both parties, and was without fraud and without prejudice to either party. They attack us for not throwing out the returns in this instance where it is admitted by both parties that there was no fraud and that the right thing was done to preserve the votes of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I have already, I believe, consumed the time so kindly allotted to me by my colleague on the committee who has charge of this case. I shall not enter into the personal matters between the contestant and the contestee, so unfortunately brought into the discussion by the contestee at the close of his argument. I know something of the contestant in this case, not by long personal acquaintance, but by the judgment and statement of gentlemen of Kentucky, some of whom have been driven out of the Democratic party by unfair election methods in that State, and some of whom have by those same methods been driven in disgust from the State.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this committee did not care whether he was a Republican or a Democrat. But if it be true, as stated by the contestant, that no attractiveness of the Republican party but only the improper conduct of the Democratic party has removed the contestant from the ranks of that party, the contestant is welcome to all the comfort out of that situation he can extract from it. All the committee cares about and all it desires to certify to this House is that, upon a careful, honest, conscientious investigation of this record, the contestant in the case is, beyond any possible doubt, entitled to a seat in this House.

Mr. KEHOE. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Very well.

Mr. KEHOE. Does the gentleman mean to convey the idea to the House that in any precinct the clerk of elections in Kentucky has the deciding vote as to the ballots or who shall be allowed to vote on election day?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do not know that I do. In the first place, I have read the Kentucky law, which should satisfy the gentleman. I then explained to this House that in a question of registration, of deciding who is entitled to go to the polls and vote, the clerk had the controlling vote; and I further said that where the gentleman's party needed a sheriff, it took him, and where it needed a clerk, it took him. The gentleman should not ask me whether I intended to say something I did not say.

Mr. KEHOE. And how many places in the district were there registrations?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do not know. I took three out of four places mentioned by the contestee on which to base my argument. I am meeting the very argument produced in this case by the contestee himself.

Mr. KEHOE. I will ask the gentleman whether the law is not as the contestant stated it to be, that in every case where a ballot is questioned the sheriff is the umpire. Is not that the law?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I have not denied it.

Mr. KEHOE. That is the law.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I read the law itself as the basis of my remarks, and I said that the clerk had the control, the casting voice, on the question of registration, and I followed that by the statement that, as a general rule, where you needed the sheriff you had him, and where you needed the clerk you had him.

Mr. Speaker, I leave the question to the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while it is undoubtedly true, as stated by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES], who has just spoken, that under the Kentucky law the Democratic party, or the party which is in power, may prefer its own interest in the appointment of clerk or sheriff as it pleases, so far as I am concerned I make no complaint of that. I make no complaint that any party in power which has the selection of three officials, two of whom shall be of one party and one from another, selects two from its own side. And, Mr. Speaker, the question is not involved in this case whether the election officers of Kentucky were honest or honorable or fair dealing in their action in counting the ballots except in one or two precincts. We admit that the judges of election under the Kentucky election law were justified in sending to a higher tribunal for decision the question whether these re-marked ballots should be counted or not; and they performed a proper duty on their part when they returned these ballots in such a way that they might be laid before the House of Representatives itself, which should determine upon their validity.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss or reply at length to the arguments which have been made in favor of the minority report; but I think I would be wanting in fairness to the majority of this House if I did not reply to one or two statements which have been made and arguments which have been advanced on wholly false premises. We were told in the brief filed in behalf of the contestee in the first place that it was necessary to have the "true statement" there referred to attached to each ballot. The statement in the contestee's brief, construing the decisions of the Kentucky courts, was, "unless each ballot is accompanied with a true statement;" and again, "Its relation to the particular ballot it refers to must be clearly shown by attaching them together."

We attacked that decision. The contestee had construed the decision of the Kentucky court and said that it meant what he stated in his brief. We have attacked that decision, and, lo and behold, they have abandoned it on the floor of the House. What they contended the supreme court of Kentucky had decided was so absurd in the light of the report of the majority that on the floor their first speaker abandoned the contention and said that the law only meant that the ballots should be put in two different piles.

Mr. Speaker, the supreme court of Kentucky, or court of appeals, which is the same thing, have decided that a "true statement" in accordance with the law must be preserved and presented; and the "true statement" in each case is found in this record where we have counted the ballots.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Fox] yesterday called the attention of the House to the volume containing the ballots from West Door precinct, No. 9, in Simpson County, and because he did not wish to be interrupted I made no interruption as he stood there showing the ballots to the members on the floor of the House and calling their attention to the fact that he could find in that volume of ballots a number which they could not distinguish as to which had the actual mark and which the remark. But, Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee shows that in this volume of ballots there were 20 ballots which the committee did not count, for the very reason which the gentleman urged, and those were the ballots which he was showing to the members of the House as ballots which could not be distinguished and which we had counted. We did not count the ballots which the gentleman disclosed to the House.

Mr. FOX. I beg the gentleman's pardon. What he states is not the truth. I never did exhibit a single ballot to the House but what was counted by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FOX. It would have been a disgrace to myself and an insult to this House for me to have presented ballots here that had not been counted by the committee, and I deny that I did so.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has finished, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FOX. There was no necessity for the gentleman to make such a statement as that, because I would have been unworthy of membership in this House and unworthy of being recognized as a gentleman if I had condescended to do such a thing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Mississippi had had patience enough to contain his soul, he would have found that I absolved him from any intentional purpose to deceive the House—

Mr. FOX. I will not allow a statement of that sort to be made here which impeaches my character as a gentleman and a man of honor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is not in order. He has no right to address the House unless upon recognition of the Speaker and with the permission of the gentleman on the floor.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to let the gentleman from Mississippi make the statement he has made. I would not believe for a moment—and I am very sorry the gentleman understood me as implying such a thing—that he would intentionally mislead the House. I believe the gentleman from Mississippi to be a man of the highest honor, and I will not be led by his passionate and hasty remark into saying anything to the contrary. I hope I have self-possession enough to not permit hasty remarks such as he has made to turn me from my even way and from my pleasurable acquaintance with the gentleman. But the gentleman from Mississippi did show to the House or call to the attention of the House the ballots from West Door precinct, No. 9, in Simpson County, and showed to the House ballots which he contended ought not to be counted because we could not tell which was the original mark and which was the imprinted, and the report of the committee shows that from that precinct there were 20 ballots which the committee did not count, a majority of which were marked in the Republican circle.

Whatever may have been the intention of the gentleman on the floor of the House—and I would not for a moment accuse him or any other colleague of mine upon the committee, for all of whom I have the highest respect, of intentionally deceiving the House—but when the gentleman showed these ballots I knew which ballots were counted and which were not by the majority of the committee, and the ballots which the gentleman showed were not counted for the contestant by the majority of the committee in this case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another complaint which has been made by the contestee is in reference to Ferguson precinct, No. 20, in Logan county, and, Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful of the splendid, passionate eloquence of the gentleman from Kentucky. I shall only say that in my opinion he made a much stronger argument and a much more eloquent speech and a much better presentation of his case when he argued his own case before the committee than he did upon the floor of the House.

The gentleman from Kentucky makes most of his argument in reference to the points in his brief on which the committee sustained him. Most of the argument which the contestee made was about cases where the committee sustained the contention of the contestee. Most of his argument was addressed to counties like Logan and Barren counties, and in those cases we sustained the contention of the contestee; but he says that in Ferguson precinct, No. 20, Logan County, the Democratic clerk got drunk, and he complains because the committee did not say the man was drunk instead of merely saying that his conduct was reprehensible. He says that in that precinct the committee sustained the contestee against his interest. I call the attention of the House to the claim made by the contestee in reference to this precinct, which he now says ought to be thrown out altogether. The contestee now says that the committee ought to have rejected the returns from Ferguson precinct, but when he prepared his brief and when he argued his case before the committee he took a different notion of the matter. Referring to the precinct, the contestee in his brief says:

There is no charge here that the return is false or fraudulent. There is no claim that any person was intimidated or that any person who desired to vote was prevented by fear of violence from so doing. * * * It is shown conclusively by all of the witnesses that every voter who went to the election and desired to vote was allowed to do so.

That was the contention which the contestee presented to the committee, and the majority of the committee sustained his contention and permitted the returns to stand. Nor is it true that if the committee had thrown out the returns it would have been to the interest of the contestee. The contestee stated that he placed upon the witness stand, as I remember, 144 witnesses to testify that they voted for him. He did not place upon the witness stand 144 witnesses, though he did claim, and it is claimed that the testimony which he did introduce showed that 144 persons voted for him, and he says that there was no testimony to show how many voted for the contestant.

The gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee, was mistaken. The contestant upon the returns had 85 votes. The evidence before the committee showed that there were counted for him on the night of the election 89 votes from the ballots, and that there were 89 votes for the contestant instead of the 85 returned; and if the committee had thrown out the returns, it would have increased on the evidence the vote of the contestant from this precinct and decreased the vote of the contestee from this precinct. If the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee, were half so good a lawyer as he is an orator, he would have known what the facts in the record showed in the case.

I call for a moment the attention of the House to another case that the contestee referred to, and that is the Electric Light precinct No. 20, in Warren County. In this precinct the judges of the election, in making their returns, did not certify as to the number of ballots not voted and destroyed at the election. The election law of Kentucky provides that immediately after the polls are closed, and before the ballots are counted, the unvoted ballots shall be torn from the book and destroyed by the election officials. The contestee claims that in this precinct the returns did not show whether these ballots were destroyed or not, and thereupon he builds a fanciful and chimerical imaginative tale about the attorney for the contestant.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it would be perfectly absurd for the House to reject the returns from a precinct because the judges of election had omitted to state the number of unvoted ballots which they had destroyed; and if this class of returns were to be rejected as the contestee desires, it would reduce his majority a thousand votes. The contestee in this contest received in the county of Barren 3,144 votes, and the contestant received 2,246, nearly a majority of 1,000 for the contestee, and in no precinct from the county was the return made which the contestee insists should be made. Ah, but he says, what of the 44 ballots which were not voted in Electric Light precinct? And thereupon the contestee now charges that the record shows that the rejected ballots had been turned over to the possession of the attorney for the contestant and left in his possession, so that a portion of the ballots which were actually returned might be taken out and have substituted for them these 44 ballots which were not voted. I deny it. The record shows nothing of the sort.

The record shows, Mr. Speaker, that these rejected ballots, according to the law, were returned by the sheriff of the precinct to the county clerk; that they were turned over by the county clerk to the Democratic board of election commissioners of the county; that the envelope containing them was opened by the Democratic election commissioners, and when so opened returned to the county clerk. The record shows that the county clerk permitted both the contestant and his attorneys and the contestee's attorneys to examine these ballots in his presence and while in his possession—a proper proceeding.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, we do not have to depend upon that testimony, even although these ballots are traced from one official to another as a registered letter is traced from one officer handling it to another. We have the ballots in our possession which were returned from this precinct where the contestee charges that fraudulent or other ballots have been substituted in their place, and I invite the attention of the gentlemen of the minority to the fact that each of these ballots in the record bears the original signature of the Democratic clerk of this election precinct. No question is raised in reference to it. Each of these ballots when given out to be voted was signed by the Democratic clerk of election. Each of these ballots is here in the record, signed by this Democratic clerk of election, and the charge that other ballots have been substituted in their place by the attorney for the contestant was a cowardly charge, unworthy of a man who has the standing of the contestee.

The contestant's attorney has no opportunity to appear here; and I take the responsibility of saying that in the interest of what I believe to be the proper conduct of the trial of any litigation, I refused to permit the contestant to speak on the floor of this House in this contest. I do not believe in litigants arguing their own cases. I think the contestee would have left a better impression upon the House if he had omitted the scurrilous remarks, which no gentleman ought to make without an opportunity for reply, and which no gentleman ought to make under any circumstances. I refuse to permit this case to degenerate into a question of billingsgate between the two parties in contest. I decline to permit the contestants to engage in the business of fishwives replying to each other. The contestant appeared before the committee, and to a certain extent argued his case there, and, I may say, he made as good an argument as I have ever heard in the room of the Committee on Contested Election Cases. As between the character of the two, Mr. Speaker, it is not for us to decide. We decide upon the record before us. The citizens and voters of the Third district of Kentucky have decided between the two gentlemen, and they have expressed their approbation for the gentleman whom I hope will soon be the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestant in this case. He has the support of the majority of the people who voted at this election. He can afford to let go without reply the contemptuous remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, the contestee.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute resolution which is pending for consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that it be reported.

Mr. FOX. And I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that the substitute be reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the substitute will be again reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The substitute resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The substitute resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. McKenzie Moss was not elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of Kentucky, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John S. Rhea was elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Kentucky, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 136, answered "present" 13, not voting 82; as follows:

So the resolutions were not agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. LANDIS with Mr. CLARK.

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. McRAE.

Mr. CROMER with Mr. MIERS of Indiana.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. STEWART with New Jersey with Mr. WOOTEN.

Mr. REEVES with Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. MAHONEY.

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. SNOOK.

Mr. SHOWALTER with Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. SHEPPARD.

Mr. KEICHAM with Mr. SNODGRASS.

Mr. KYLE with Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. JONES of Washington with Mr. BRUNDIDGE.

Mr. MCCALL with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. BURTON with Mr. BALL of Texas.

Mr. LESSLER with Mr. DOUGHERTY.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont with Mr. POU.

For this session:

Mr. COOMBS with Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BENTON.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. MEYER of Louisiana.

Mr. JOY with Mr. MADDOX, until April 1.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. RUCKER, for one week.

Mr. OLMSTED with Mr. WILEY, until Wednesday.

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. SMALL, until Thursday.

For this day:

Mr. SHELLEN with Mr. FEELY.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania with Mr. McDERMOTT.

Mr. TIRRELL with Mr. THAYER.

On contested-election case—Moss v. Rhea of Kentucky:

Mr. SIBLEY with Mr. FOSTER of Illinois.

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. TRIMBLE.

Mr. CURTIS with Mr. McANDREWS.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. CREAMER.

Mr. OVERSTREET with Mr. HANBURY (Mr. OVERSTREET for contestant and Mr. HANBURY for contestee).

Mr. BEIDLER with Mr. BROUSSARD, on this vote.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the announcement of the pairs a pair between the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. OVERSTREET, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. HANBURY. I understand Mr. HANBURY voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will repeat his statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. I notice in the announcement of the pairs a pair between Mr. OVERSTREET and Mr. HANBURY, of New York.

My recollection is that Mr. HANBURY—I do not know whether he is here—has voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is in order on a question of pairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded as voting in the affirmative. The House can not decide that question. It is a matter of honor for any gentleman as to whether he will observe his pair. The Chair knows of no law governing the matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose, if Mr. HANBURY—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for the regular order. I can not understand that the gentleman has any right in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay" on the first roll call. I was in the gallery when the second roll was called, and my name was called on the second roll call. I was in my seat and voted on the first roll call, and voted "nay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded as voting. Does the gentleman state that he voted on the first call?

Mr. HASKINS. I voted on the first call "nay" very distinctly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recorded according to the statement of facts.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the original resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FOX. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Rhea, I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. Is it renewed? [After a pause.] Without objection, the order for the yeas and nays will be canceled and a vote taken viva voce.

The question was taken; and the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the contestant, Mr. Moss, be allowed to take the oath of office.

Thereupon J. McKenzie Moss appeared at the bar of the House, accompanied by Mr. MANN, of Illinois, and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HANBURY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I understand that it was announced that I, having a pair, had voted. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. The RECORD so shows.

Mr. HANBURY. I wish to correct the RECORD then. I did not vote after I was paired, but after I voted I was paired for the next roll call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement will be entered in the RECORD.

BOARD OF MANAGERS FOR NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 171.

Resolved, etc., That Henry E. Palmer, of Nebraska, GEORGE W. STEELE, of Indiana, WALTER P. BROWNLOW, of Tennessee, T. J. Henderson, of Illinois, and J. M. Brown, of Maine, be, and the same hereby are, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States—Henry E. Palmer to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Gen. William J. Sewell, whose term of service expires April 21, 1904; GEORGE W. STEELE to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902; WALTER P. BROWNLOW to succeed Gen. William B. Franklin, whose term of service expires April 21, 1902; T. J. Henderson to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902; J. M. Brown to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this is a unanimous report?

Mr. HULL. It is a unanimous report made by the committee, and it is requested that it be passed to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the engrossment of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BEIDLER, for this week, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3136. An act for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3865. An act to establish light-houses at the mouth of Boston Harbor to mark the entrance to the Broad Sound Channel;

S. R. 21. Joint resolution authorizing the printing of extra copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions; and

S. 2291. An act for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 156. An act to provide for the repayment of unexpended moneys deposited to cover costs of platting and office work in connection with mining claims—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

S. 637. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon, at Georgetown, State of South Carolina—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 912. An act to reimburse certain Lower Brule Sioux Indians, of South Dakota, for property destroyed—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 3060. An act appropriating $5,000 to inclose and beautify the monument on the Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3492. An act to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Eagle Harbor, on Keweenaw Point, Michigan—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4264. An act providing that the statutes of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in any courts for the recovery of lands patented under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians—to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

S. R. 26. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to negotiate with John T. Dolan, of Portland, Oreg., for purchase of original manuscript copy of "order book of Gen. Arthur St. Clair"—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 12804, being the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would state to the House that by agreement of the committee, if ratified by the House, general debate shall run for ten hours, five hours on a side, the time to be controlled on the majority side by the chairman of the committee and on the minority side by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], and I ask unanimous consent that that agreement may be ratified now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the pending bill be limited to ten hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The motion of Mr. HULL was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HEMENWAY in the chair.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the House with any speech this afternoon, and in fact I could see no reason why general debate should run for ten hours on the bill. The measure reported to the House covers the usual items, and with few exceptions does not depart from the legitimate rules of the House. There are two or three items in the bill clearly subject to a point of order, if one should be made.

The estimate submitted to the committee called for appropriations amounting to $101,905,940.03. The bill carries appropriations amounting to $90,880,943.41. The reduction is largely made by the reduction in the Army and by the reduced cost of the transportation of the Army. The appropriation of last year was about $113,000,000, with some deficiencies made afterwards, taking it up to about $117,000,000; so the appropriation for the next fiscal year will be something over $26,000,000 less than for the last fiscal year.

On the hearings before the committee I believe we have appropriated for every legitimate and necessary expenditure for the Army for the next fiscal year, unless the Army shall be largely increased, a contingency that none of us anticipate. The discontinuance of the army of occupation in Cuba and taking off the transport service from the Atlantic Ocean has largely cut down the expenses for transportation of the Army and its supplies, leaving only a small army that we have in Porto Rico and the army of the Philippines to be provided for by this bill outside of the United States proper. So that I think $28,000,000, as against $38,000,000 for last year, will be ample for all that the Government will need.

The parts of this bill which are new legislation will be found to be of minor importance. On page 5 there is one clause providing for 50 first-class surgeons in the Signal Corps. Of course, we shall discuss the necessity of that when we reach it under the five-minute rule. There are one or two other places where minor changes of the law will be found, which will be submitted to the judgment of the House as we reach them during the reading of the bill, without any attempt to hide anything that has been done. Attention should have been called to these items in the report, but on account of my absence and the hurried method in which the report was prepared that has not been done in this case, as we have usually done in bills which I have reported in the past. I think, Mr. Chairman, this is all I desire to say on the bill now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question. I saw in the New York Times of yesterday a statement of an incident in Mindanao, where our signal corps had been captured by 200 Moros and one of our men killed. They captured the transportation of the detachment, including four pack mules, so this report states. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, we do not propose to legislate on that subject in this bill. We provide for a signal corps—

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire to ask this question—

Mr. HULL. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the signal corps go around in these islands unprotected?

Mr. HULL. The members of this signal corps are themselves soldiers; they go where they are ordered. Of course the commanding general is supposed to know about the size of the force proper to be sent out. Whether in this case they were fooled by the apparently friendly disposition heretofore manifested by the natives, I am unable to say. I only know what I have seen in the public prints; and the gentleman from Tennessee has as much information on the subject as I have.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This seems to have been a small corps operating in that so-called peaceful territory; and they were captured. The press report, as I remember it, states that some were killed.

Mr. HULL. I do not like to have the time occupied in this way with a matter which is entirely irrelevant.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just one word more. Does the gentleman approve of the policy of sending a mere handful of men around in this way and having them butchered?

Mr. HULL. I suppose, as a matter of fact, wherever conditions exist that are not lawful, and still there is not a state of war, it is very difficult to tell just how many people should go out upon an expedition of this kind. I have known cases, even in this country, where men sent out with a paymaster in the Rocky Mountains were overpowered, a part of the escort killed, and the treasure looted. But I would hardly say that that was a matter for legislation on an appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the other side claimed that they had members enough desiring to speak to occupy at least twelve hours in general debate on this bill. I would be glad if some of them would go ahead. I very much doubt whether we shall use anything like our five hours.

Mr. SULZER. If you have time to spare, we would be very glad to occupy it.

Mr. HULL. I would prefer to go on with the bill.

Mr. SULZER. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SCARBOROUGH].

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state at the outset that the remarks I shall submit to the House this afternoon will not have reference to the pending question. My purpose is, in the time allotted to me, to say something in regard to what might be characterized as "the Southern question." The only apology, Mr. Chairman, I have to make for obtruding my remarks upon this question at this time is that it is currently reported and well understood that when the resolution requiring an investigation into the suffrage laws of the different States is reported, no time, or very little time, will be allowed for general debate; therefore, if I can have the attention of the House for a few minutes I desire to place my views upon record.

It is well understood in political circles that the solid South is not a dream or a supposititious condition or situation, but is a real fact. Standing, then, upon the threshold of this discussion, I purpose offering some reasons for the existence of this situation and explaining briefly why there is in one section of this country a people solidly and unanimously united in matters of politics.

It will be my purpose, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this question, to say nothing which may tend to irritate the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber, nothing calculated to arouse their passions or their prejudices. But it is my purpose to state facts as they are, and appeal to the sober common sense, as well as to the sense of justice, of the gentlemen who occupy seats upon this floor.

It is a well-known fact that the people of the section which I have the honor in part to represent are allied with the Democratic party, and the reason that this party is so largely in the majority in that section is not only because of the treatment which the South in the past has received at the hands of the dominant party, but because we believe with all our hearts that the Democratic party stands for all that is highest and best in government—the things best suited to our condition and to the condition of the country at large.

Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, has the resolution known as the Dick resolution been introduced in this body? What has caused the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber to conclude that it is necessary or proper that this resolution should be offered? Whence comes the demand for this proposed legislation? Is it a result of a broad spirit of patriotism and love of country found in the breasts of our Republican friends? Who is so ignorant as to answer yes? The fact is, gentlemen, this resolution is the offspring of sectionalism—narrow, bigoted sectionalism. The conservative people in every section of this great Union desire to see close fraternal relations exist between all our people. It has been our boast, as well as our hope, that the new century would be free from the bigotry and rancor of the old. We of the South had hoped that we would be allowed to work out "our manifest destiny" without the patronizing, demagogical supervision and espionage of politicians and mercenary statesmen. I have no idea that the great body of the people of those States from which come the advocates of this measure desire any such legislation.

The people of the South do not now nor have they ever presumed to dictate to other sections of the country as to their suffrage laws and matters of domestic policy. Local self-government is a principle dear to the heart of every true American, and gentlemen who advocate the Dick resolution need not delude themselves with the idea that the people of this great country demand this legislation or will sustain those who attempt it.

Again, what good is the pending measure intended to conserve? Does the great Republican party see a handwriting on the wall and fear that the South will once again control legislation and shape the policies of this Government? Considering present conditions, the dominant party's large majority in this body, the arbitrary rules foisted upon the House, and its consequent absolute control of legislation upon this floor, I again ask, What good is to result from the proposed investigation of the suffrage laws of Southern States? What good is to come from the proposed reduction of Southern representation, when you already have legislation in your own hands? Yes, it is a fact that there is a solid South, and it will remain so.

The people of that section are obliged to stand together for their common defense. We would have it otherwise. We would have conditions more conducive to larger individual freedom of opinion, but the attitude of the Republican party toward the governing class in the Southern States has made the solid South a necessary political condition. It is a matter of surprise to the people of the South that the leaders of the Republican party should persistently interfere in the domestic affairs of the Southern States and by vicious legislation thwart them in their efforts to build up their section. The Republican party seems to lose sight of the fact that we of the South are more than Southerners—that we are Americans, of kin to the people of every other section of our country, connected by birth, history, and tradition with you of the North, bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh, as proud of the Anglo-Saxon blood in our veins as are you. And yet, Americans though we all are, some of you are prone by vicious legislation to oppress your brethren and kinsmen under the specious guise of aiding an alien and an inferior race found in our midst, and for whose presence in our locality you are largely responsible.

To my mind the Golden Rule is as applicable to political as to private affairs, and under its binding sanction we demand at your hands the same measure of consideration which you expect us to accord you.

This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

The condition which the advocates of this resolution claim exists in Southern States is greatly exaggerated and misunderstood, but so far as it does exist the responsibility therefor lies at the door of the Republican party. We have high authority for this statement. Mr. Blaine, one of the leading lights of the Republican party, and in many respects superior to his party, in his book Twenty Years in Congress admits the truth of this proposition. In speaking of some of the conditions which resulted from the civil war and the reconstruction methods of his party he said:

The consequence was that some of the States had wretched government, officered by bad men, who misled the negroes and engaged in riotous corruption. Their transgressions were made so conspicuous that the Republican leaders of other Southern States, who were really trying to act their part worthily and honorably, were obscured from view and did not obtain a fair hearing at the bar of public opinion.

The government of South Carolina under its series of Republican administrations was of such character as brought shame upon the Republican party, exposed the negro voters to unmerited obloquy, and thus wrought for the cause of free government and equal suffrage at the South incalculable harm.

This situation, honestly stated by your great leader, is the problem with which the South has had to grapple for a third of a century. The people of that section alone understand the true situation; they alone are competent to settle what you call the Southern question. The Southland is their home and country, and they will control it in spite of the ravings of bitter partisans and politicians. When you tell us that we oppress the freedman and deny him the right to vote, we ask what is the status of the large number of negroes found in your section of the country? Notwithstanding the fact that those among you are of a higher type than the great majority found in our midst, yet how many negroes hold office in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other great States whose Representatives upon this floor are so extremely solicitous of the welfare of their Southern brothers in black? How many of you recognize them as your social and political equals, vote for them for political positions, or try to lead them into the higher walks of life? And yet, be it said to your shame, in this the highest law-making body in the American Union, you declare by your conduct, if not by your words, that we of the South should accord to the colored man privileges which you yourselves deny him.

The situation in the South is peculiar, two distinct races occupying the same territory. One race the owners of the soil and until recently the absolute owners of the other race. One race the highest type of civilized man. The other a people without a country, just freed from the yoke of bondage, ignorant of the rights and duties of citizens, and yet by cruel, wicked, and unphilosophical legislation suddenly placed upon the same legal footing with the other, declared to be the equal before the law, and entitled to share equally in the functions of government. The situation is without a parallel in modern history, and for its proper solution we need reason and cool judgment, exercised by broad-minded statesmen rather than by bitter partisans. As a result of the bitterness engendered by the civil war the Republican party deliberately undertook to humiliate the people of the Southern States. That party, for its own purposes, ignoring its duty to the common country, and particularly to the southern section, thrust the ballot into the hands of the untutored and irresponsible freedmen, declared him the equal of his former master, and even placed him in the halls of state. It is needless, however, to say more upon that feature of the situation. The bitter struggle of the South is recent history, and I have no desire to revive those unpleasant memories. The people of that section have met the issue fairly, have solved it in a reasonable, philosophical, and legal way.

It is a case of "the survival of the fittest."

The so-called Southern question is a sociological question, and not a political one. It can never be successfully solved as a political problem, and the more such attempts are made the more complicated and annoying will the situation become.

But we are told by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, as well as by newspapers that echo the enlightened (?) sentiment of the Republican party, that Representatives from the Southern States need not become excited or go into hysterics over this proposition; that no wrong is intended, and that there is no disposition to place the South under negro domination and control. What, then, is the purpose of this resolution? Is it to conserve the best interests of this country, the best interests of the Southern States, or is it not rather to advance the interests of the Republican party?

We hear it said, however, that the real purpose is to reduce the representation from the Southern States in accordance with the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. We deny the right of this body to interfere with our representation as at present composed. The Constitution of the United States declares that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen from the several States of the Union in proportion to population. It has never been the theory of this Government that representation should be predicated upon the number of electors in a State, but only upon population; and each Representative upon this floor is the spokesman not only of the electors in his district, but of all the people, whatever their condition, white or black, male or female.

It is true that section 2 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reaffirming the doctrine of representation based on population, does provide that representation may be reduced in any State where male inhabitants, otherwise qualified, are disfranchised on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. But even then this body can not constitutionally reduce the representation of any State unless it can show the exact proportion that such disfranchised persons bear to the whole number of electors. Furthermore, the proviso would not be applicable if the abridgement of the right of suffrage applies to all classes alike. Another section of the Constitution provides that—

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Therefore, beyond question, the Federal Constitution concedes to the several States the right to determine for themselves the qualifications of their voters. Here again it appears that we should treat the so-called Southern question as a sociological proposition, and deal with the freedmen of the South with the same freedom that all the States of this Union exercise in dealing with the question of woman suffrage. In other words, each State has the right to extend or withhold the elective franchise according to the enlightened conscience of its people, provided, of course, there is no discrimination as to class.

Strange things happen in the school of politics. Gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber, who will doubtless vote for the Dick resolution when it is reported, and thereby provide for a committee to go into the Southern States to examine into the condition of our suffrage laws, are radically inconsistent. The Southern black man is the object of their especial care, and yet the Filipino is considered neither competent nor worthy to cast a ballot in the land which is their birthplace and for which they are fighting to-day. In the discussion of the Philippine tariff bill it was vehemently denied by some of the Republicans upon this floor that Filipinos are capable of governing themselves, and yet, so blinded by prejudice and swayed by partisan zeal, you demand that the people of the South submit to negro domination, for you know that that would be the practical effect of the complete enfranchisement of the Southern black. Filipinos, according to your argument, are unfit to govern themselves, while on the other hand you seem to consider that the Southern black men are capable of governing Anglo-Saxons, your brethren. Allow me to quote from the published report of the Philippine Commission:

In this condition of affairs we have thought that we ought first to reduce the electorate to those who could be considered intelligent, and so the qualifications for voting fixed in the municipal code are that the voter shall either speak, read, and write English or Spanish or that he shall have been formerly a municipal officer or that he shall pay a tax equal to $15 a year or own property to the value of $250.

If such is your judgment in regard to the Filipinos, a people who have at least a measure of civilization and a kind of government, why is it that you want to remove all restriction from the negro and give him the right to vote regardless of qualification?

Speaking particularly for the State of South Carolina, we are willing to rest our case upon the record; we are willing to have the constitution of 1895 construed in the light of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It is true these amendments are the product, not of the cool and deliberate judgment of the wisest statesmen of the period in which they were adopted, but rather are the offspring of the passion and rancor prevailing at that period.

The ratification of those amendments, so far as the South is concerned, was obtained at the point of the bayonet. I have no desire, however, to reopen those unpleasant questions or give utterance to thoughts unbecoming this period of our history or unbecoming a representative of a great people. Yet the introduction of this resolution emphasizes the fact that the spirit of 1860 is still abroad in the land. Whatever may have been the sentiment of the great body of the people of the North at the time those amendments were adopted, one thing is certain—the conservative people throughout the entire country now confess that the enfranchisement of the negro was a mistake, a mistake of the Republican party, a mistake the bitter consequences of which we have had to suffer, while you have stood by and expressed amazement that the people of the South have not gracefully submitted to this great injustice and have not been ready to kiss the hand that smote them.

The right of suffrage is neither a natural nor an absolute right. It is not one guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. It is a relative right, one which is subject to control, and the people of the sovereign States composing this Union have the right to declare for themselves who shall be entitled to cast the ballot. This right is inherent in the State as a sovereign, and no power anywhere can deny this exercise of sovereignty unless it is exercised in such a way as to contravene the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Federal Constitution. Here again let me quote from that eminent Republican, Mr. Blaine, speaking with reference to the adoption of those amendments.

Mr. Blaine, in his speech on "Basis of representation in Congress," used this language:

These propositions differ somewhat in phrase, but they all embrace the one idea, substantially, of making suffrage, instead of population, the basis of apportioning Representatives; or, in other words, to give the States in future a representation proportioned to their voters instead of their inhabitants. * * *

As an abstract proposition, no one will deny that population is the true basis of representation, for women, children, and other non-voting classes may have as vital an interest in the legislation of the country as those who actually deposit the ballot. Indeed, the very amendment we are discussing implies that population is the true basis, inasmuch as the exclusion of the black people of the South from political rights has suggested this indirectly coercive mode of securing them those rights. Were the negroes to be enfranchised throughout the South to-day, no one would insist on the adoption of this amendment, and yet if the amendment shall be incorporated in the Federal Constitution its incidental evils will abide in the loyal States long after the direct evil which it aims to cure may have been eradicated in the Southern States.

Basing representation on voters, unless Congress should be empowered to define their qualifications, would tend to cheapen suffrage everywhere. There would be an unseemly scramble in all the States during each decade to increase by every means the number of voters, and all conservative restrictions such as the requirement of reading and writing, now enforced in some of the States, would be stricken down in a rash and reckless effort to procure an enlarged representation in the national councils. Foreigners would be invited to vote on a mere preliminary "declaration of intentions."

In these latter days it has been found that the Federal Constitution, which has been of force for more than a hundred years, is somewhat in the way of those who are now in charge of our Governmental affairs. And while as to some questions the Republican party insists upon a strict construction of the Constitution, yet when they find it necessary to have at least some apparent authority for doing an act which in the past has been considered foreign to the purposes and principles of our Government they want a liberal construction. So when we come to discuss the so-called Southern question, and ask why this resolution has been introduced, we are pointed to the Constitution and its amendments and reminded, "Thus saith the law."

The Constitution has been found sufficiently elastic to adjust itself to the changed conditions of the country, and the highest court in the land has interpreted it in the light of present circumstances and in a philosophical way rather than in a strict and truly legal way. In other words, the decisions of our Supreme Court indicate that the Constitution will not be allowed to stand in the way of the present Administration. Whether we believe its construction relative to the powers of this Government to acquire and control foreign territory is sound and in keeping with our past history and traditions is of no importance now. The court has declared the law. So when we come to consider the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments as applied to existing Southern conditions, we ask for a fair and liberal interpretation, like that you place upon other provisions of the Constitution in dealing with Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that we have made invidious distinctions in our suffrage laws in the South, and that therefore there should be an investigation to see whether or not we are denying the right of suffrage to anyone contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. It is unnecessary that I enter upon any further discussion of the legal questions that arise under this proposition. It will be time enough to argue that phase of the case when the proposed committee shall have made its report. But speaking particularly for the State of South Carolina, I dare to say that so far as their legality is concerned we are willing for you to make a most rigid investigation of our suffrage laws. We are willing to stand by the constitution and laws which we have adopted, and we believe that when it becomes a practical question we will be able upon purely legal grounds to satisfy even a partisan majority that we are right in our contentions and that we have not illegally treated the colored people of the South. The suffrage laws of South Carolina are fair and apply to all alike. We have simply a property and educational qualification.

Mr. PALMER. Then why do you object to the inquiry?

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. I object to the inquiry, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, because it is un-American. One of the greatest constitutional rights of the individual American is the right to be exempt in his person and in his property from unwarranted search and seizure, and that is the principle which actuates the Southern man. We are willing for you to investigate, provided you were going there as broad-minded Americans; but we do not propose to sit silent and see this resolution adopted knowing that you have prejudged the case and will come back to this Congress and make a prejudiced report. If you would go in a broad American spirit, we would welcome you. When you claim that you have a right to go there, we admit it. We admit that this Congress has a right to make an investigation, but we do not admit that you have a right to go there for the avowed purpose which you have in view.

As a matter of fact, the so-called Southern question loses its importance when we eliminate politics from it. There are none in the South who desire to interfere with the legal and vested rights of those who live upon our soil. Again, speaking with special reference to the State of South Carolina, I submit that no unprejudiced person can claim that our suffrage laws are obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States. The constitution of South Carolina, section 3 of Article II, provides:

Every male citizen of this State and of the United States, 21 years of age and upward, not laboring under the disabilities named in this constitution, and possessing the qualifications required by it, shall be an elector.

SEC. 4. The qualifications for suffrage shall be as follows:

(a) Residence in the State for two years, in the county one year, in the polling precinct in which the elector offers to vote four months, and the payment, six months before any election, of the poll tax then due and payable; Provided, That ministers in charge of an organized church and teachers of public schools shall be entitled to vote after six months' residence in the State, otherwise qualified.

(b) Registration which shall provide for the enrollment of every elector once in ten years, and also an enrollment during each and every year of every elector not previously registered under the provisions of this article.

(c) Up to January 1, 1898, all male persons of voting age applying for registration who can read any section of this constitution submitted to them by the registration officer, or understand and explain it when read to them by the registration officer, shall be entitled to register and become electors. A separate record of all persons registered before January 1, 1898, sworn to by the registration officer, shall be filed, one copy with the clerk of court and one in the office of secretary of state, on or before February 1, 1898, and such persons shall remain during life qualified electors unless disqualified by the other provisions of this article. The certificate of the clerk of court or secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the right of said citizens to any subsequent registration and the franchise under the limitations herein imposed.

(d) Any person who shall apply for registration after January 1, 1898, if otherwise qualified, shall be registered: Provided, That he can both read and write any section of this constitution submitted to him by the registration officer or can show that he owns and has paid all the taxes collectible during the previous year on property in this State assessed at $300 or more.

(e) Managers of election shall require of every voter offering to vote at any election, before allowing him to vote, proof of the payment of all taxes, including poll tax, assessed against him and collectible during the previous year. The production of a certificate or the receipt of the officer authorized to collect such taxes shall be conclusive proof of the payment thereof.

(f) The general assembly shall provide for issuing to each duly registered elector a certificate of registration, and shall provide for the renewal of such certificate when lost, mutilated, or destroyed, if the applicant is still a qualified elector under the provisions of this constitution or if he has been registered as provided in subsection (c).

SEC. 5. Any person denied registration shall have the right of appeal to the court of common pleas, or any judge thereof, and thence to the supreme court, to determine his right to vote under the limitations imposed in this article, and on such appeal the hearing shall be de novo, and the general assembly shall provide by law for such appeal and for the correction of illegal and fraudulent registration, voting, and all other crimes against the election laws.

SEC. 6. The following persons are disqualified from being registered or voting:

First. Persons convicted of burglary, arson, obtaining goods or money under false pretenses, perjury, forgery, robbery, bribery, adultery, bigamy, wife beating, housebreaking, receiving stolen goods, breach of trust with fraudulent intent, fornication, sodomy, incest, assault with intent to ravish, miscegenation, larceny, or crimes against the election laws: Provided, That the pardon of the governor shall remove such disqualification.

Second. Persons who are idiots, insane, paupers supported at the public expense, and persons confined in any public prison.

Wherein do the foregoing clauses of our constitution contravene the Constitution of the United States? It is useless to quote authorities to sustain the position that each State has the right to adopt its own registration and election laws so long as they do not conflict with the Federal Constitution. They have the right to declare the qualifications of electors, and the courts have held that a property and educational qualification is not an illegal abridgment of the elective franchise.

Sifted down to its last analysis, it appears that South Carolina has merely followed the lead of other great States of this Union and has adopted a property and an educational qualification for suffrage, without discrimination or an attempt to abridge the rights of any particular class.

Before you criticize the people of my State relative to these salutary provisions incorporated in their constitution, examine the laws of the State in their practical operation and see whether or not our people are acting in good faith and thus attempting to improve their suffrage regulations. Many of you are doubtless ready to declare that the restrictive clauses of our constitution are aimed directly at the negro; but this is untrue. As a matter of fact, while perhaps not more than 10 per cent of the negroes of South Carolina are taxpayers, yet the white people of the State annually burden themselves by taxation to raise a fund to educate not only their own children but the negro as well. According to the census of 1900, the white population of South Carolina—that is, males of voting age in the State—is 130,375; negroes of voting age, 152,860.

According to the same census we have: Illiterate whites, 15,711; literate whites, 111,685; illiterate negroes, 83,594; literate negroes, 69,201.

According to the report of our efficient superintendent of education for 1901, there were enrolled in the public schools of the State 127,230 white pupils and 157,976 colored pupils.

Look at these figures in the light of our suffrage laws and answer: Does this situation show that we are ignoring the educational interests of the negro? Does it not rather show that the white people of the State are trying to qualify the colored race for the intelligent use of the elective franchise? South Carolina during the year 1901 expended upon her free public schools for negroes $211,287.50, in addition to the amounts expended for the maintenance of the normal summer school for colored teachers and the appropriation for Claflin University. Where, then, is the charge that the negroes are being unfairly treated? When you claim that our people are denying the right of suffrage to negroes in South Carolina in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, we deny it, and appeal to the record for the refutation of the unfair charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is in control of the time.

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. I thank the gentleman.

I started to say that while in their practical effect the suffrage laws of South Carolina do reduce the colored vote, yet they also reduce the white vote, and are not obnoxious to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution. We have no "grandfather clause;" we have no "understanding clause" now in force. We have an educational and property qualification, pure and simple, and are appropriating money every year in order that whites and blacks alike may qualify themselves for the intelligent exercise of the right of suffrage.

But I submit, gentlemen, that while we do not fear an investigation if it were fairly made, yet the proposed investigation is inopportune, unwise, and unnecessary. The relations between the two races in the South are pleasant and friendly, and only harm could result from the proposed investigation. It would tend to inject into the mind of the Southern colored man a desire which he does not now entertain—a desire to again enter into politics—and revive an agitation which in good faith we have tried to settle.

Let me repeat that there is no such thing as the Southern question viewed from our standpoint. There is no disagreement or strife between the two races in our section, and I dare to say here and now without fear of successful contradiction that apart from the interference of politicians, apart from the interference, aye, more, of the Republican party, the races of the South will continue to maintain their present pleasant and harmonious relations. Experience teaches us that this is true. It is only when designing Republican politicians stir up the colored people that we have trouble with them. The Southern question, as a matter of fact, rests in the imagination of the people who live north of the Mason and Dixon's line, and who want to make Republicans out of the Southern negro.

Now, in conclusion, I would like to ask the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber to answer as sworn Representatives: Is it a fact that you want to place a free and unrestricted ballot in the hands of the colored men of the South to enable them to exercise the elective franchise as they see fit; or is it not rather your desire and purpose to secure the ballot for them in order to advance the interests of your party and to humiliate and annoy the solidly Democratic South? Suppose it could be known that every negro in the South, if enfranchised, would vote the Democratic ticket, would you desire the passage of the Dick resolution? Would you be heard upon this floor Congress after Congress harping upon the "Southern question" and continually charging that there is an illegal suppression of the colored vote in the Southern States? I dare say there is no man in this Chamber so utterly regardless of truth as to make an assertion of that kind.

Let me once again ask why the dominant party should desire to disturb the pleasant relations that now exist between the different sections of the country and turn this sociological question into a political one?

The Anglo-Saxon people, of which we are a part, are born rulers and leaders. They have never yet surrendered nor will they ever surrender their governmental functions to any other race of people. The people of the South will find means to control the suffrage of their section in a legal and constitutional way, just as they are controlling it to-day, and they feel that they should have the hearty cooperation and help of this great American people, regardless of party affiliation, in fairly and properly carrying the "white man's burden."

Mr. Chairman, when I was elected to Congress I congratulated myself that I could make my appearance here under such auspicious circumstances. I felt that we had a reunited country; no North or South, no East or West, and that this was indeed a most auspicious time for a representative to stand at the altar of his country to be dedicated to its service.

But rude indeed has been my awakening from that fanciful dream. I must confess that I have been surprised to note that there are those who linger around the embers of hate and passion which I had thought long dead and forgotten. The blood of the sons of Southern heroes and Northern veterans has been mingled and poured out in a common cause for the honor and protection of our common country, and I had hoped this crimson tie would forever bind all sections of this fair land together.

Why, then, does the great Republican party continually threaten the South with force bills, reduction of representation in Congress, and such like, and by such conduct revive the unpleasant recollections of the past? Racial instinct is as strong in the breast of the Southern man as in that of any other in all the earth. We ask in all candor, Why are you seeking to erect a different standard for us from that by which you yourselves are governed? When in all conscience is this unholy crusade against the South to end? Think you that threats like these will terrorize the people whom I have the honor in part to represent? Think you such measures will disintegrate the South and make its people cringe and sue for peace on bended knee? We have a constitutional right to regulate our suffrage question. We have exercised that right in a plain, fair, and legitimate way. We demand that you judge us fairly, treat us as your equals, allow us to manage our own affairs under the guidance of the Constitution unawed by the rage of politicians and the arrogant and unwarranted espionage of overzealous partisans. Reason should prevail when the passions have subsided. We "appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober." [Loud applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will now use some of his time.

Mr. HULL. There is no gentleman present now on this side who desires to talk, and I do not know that anyone will really desire to do so—certainly not if the debate does not take a wider range than it has taken up to this time. I am perfectly willing, if the other side will go on now, to have charged up against me a corresponding amount of time. I shall be glad to make that arrangement, if gentlemen on the other side will occupy the time till 5 o'clock.

Mr. SULZER. Our side has already consumed an hour and fifteen minutes, and the other side only five minutes, I believe, or a little more.

Mr. HULL. I took a little time to explain the bill, but a very little.

Mr. SULZER. I think it only fair to our side that the other side should now use some of their time. If there are no members on that side who wish to go on with the debate now, I am perfectly willing that we adjourn till to-morrow morning.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to play the rôle of peacemaker, if I can, between these two very excellent gentlemen. It is now three-quarters of an hour before 5 o'clock. Why should not the gentlemen agree between themselves to charge up that time to the two sides, count it as occupied, and then let us go home?

Mr. HULL. I would be very glad to adopt the suggestion, but would much prefer to close general debate and go on with the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, we have a number of gentlemen on our side who desire to speak on this bill.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman from Connecticut wish to talk on this question?

Mr. HILL. Oh, no.

Mr. SULZER. We think it is only fair, as we have occupied nearly all the afternoon, that that side should now occupy some time. Of course if they are not ready and have no one who desires to speak, we are content to take an adjournment, but we are perfectly willing to sit here if they have anybody who desires to speak.

Mr. HULL. Suppose we divide the time from now to 5 o'clock half and half and then adjourn. I will state that I have no one here now who desires to talk at all and have no desire to take up any time.

Mr. PARKER. Why not proceed with the reading of the bill?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will consent to proceed with the reading of the bill now, I will be perfectly willing to make a liberal arrangement in regard to the five-minute rule to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The House made a rule for ten hours' general debate, and if there is no gentleman who desires to be heard, the Chair supposes it is in order to read the bill. Without objection—

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, we have occupied an hour and five minutes of our time, and they have occupied, I think, not more than ten minutes of their time, and surely it would be unjust to force us to go on now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that if the gentleman desires to discuss the question in general debate, he may proceed.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Iowa has no one on his side of the House who desires to discuss this bill?

Mr. HULL. I have, Mr. Chairman, only one man who requests thirty minutes' time, and I would not be surprised, unless the debate would live up in some way, if that would be all that we would have on this side. I am perfectly willing at this time to go to the five-minute rule.

Mr. SULZER. I am perfectly willing, then, Mr. Chairman, to do this: I am willing to take up all of the time to-morrow, and on Thursday, immediately after the approval of the Journal, to take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULL. Well, we could not make that agreement if we tried.

Mr. SULZER. Then we can not make any other agreement.

Mr. HULL. That would be a proposition that is absurd on its face.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize anyone suggested by either of the gentleman in control of the time, but if there is no one who desires to speak it is hardly proper for the committee to remain sitting here.

Mr. SULZER. Then I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (called for by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 20, noes 23.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it is hardly worth while to wait here until we count to see whether there are 100 present. I am willing to have charged off my time thirty minutes—nothing more could be done to-day anyhow in order to shorten it up—and suggest to my friends that to-morrow they have their men ready to go on with the debate; that if this state of affairs comes on to-morrow at any time we will at once proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule. I ask unanimous consent that thirty minutes may be charged off my time—

Mr. HAY. That is all right.

Mr. HULL. And not take up the time of the Committee of the House longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman [Mr. HAY] withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that thirty minutes be charged to his time. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. And ten minutes to the other side.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEMENWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12804), the Army appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. HULL (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes), the House adjourned.

Mr. TELLER. I present a memorial of the legislature of Colorado, praying for the construction of reservoirs in the arid-land States for the storage of surplus water. I ask that the memorial be read and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 2. By Mr. W. C. Harris.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the general assembly of the State of Colorado, would respectfully represent that—

Whereas the continued material growth of the Western States and the productivity of the public and private lands thereof are dependent in a large degree upon systematic irrigation of the same; and

Whereas the waters capable of successful application for such purpose can only be fully utilized by a system of reservoirs beyond the limits of local or private enterprise to construct and operate; and

Whereas there are throughout the Western States, and particularly within the limits of the State of Colorado, great areas of arid and grazing land, belonging to the United States, that are now of little or no value, but which, with the proper application of water thereto, on account of their natural fertility, would become immensely productive; and

Whereas the fullest use of all available waters, through the impounding thereof, is requisite for their development, and would open a new field for the acquisition of desirable homes under the laws of the United States, thereby relieving the congested centers of population in the East, enlarging the demands for labor, and increasing kindred and dependent industries;

Therefore your memorialists respectfully urge your honorable body to favorably consider and speedily pass appropriate laws, making adequate provision for the construction of a system of reservoirs throughout the arid West for the storage of its surplus waters, to be used for the purpose of irrigation under equitable and suitable regulations.

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the presiding officer of each House of Congress, to the Hon. HENRY M. TELLER, to the Hon. THOMAS M. PATTERSON, to the Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH, and to the Hon. JOHN C. BELL, our Senators and Representatives in Congress. And they are respectfully requested to use every effort to secure the early passage of such laws.

B. F. MONTGOMERY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

D. C. COATES,

WILLIAM J. HAMILTON,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

JAMES B. ORMAN,

Governor of the State of Colorado.

W. H. KELLY,

Secretary of the Senate.

Attest:

[SEAL.]

DAVID A. MILLS,

Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and be printed.

Mr. QUARLES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for improving the harbor at Ahnapee, Wis.; also proposing to appropriate $6,000 for improving the harbor at Port Washington, Wis., and, further, proposing to appropriate $3,000 for improving the harbor at Oconto, Wis., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for improving the harbor at Milford, Conn., from $5,000 to $15,000, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that in estimating the probable cost of improving the Connecticut River between Hartford, Conn., and Holyoke, Mass., the engineer officers appointed by the Secretary of War shall take into account both direct and consequential damages, and the annual cost of maintaining this improvement, and shall hear all parties interested in this improvement or who may be affected thereby, and proposing to appropriate $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of this board, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. K. MORRIS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish the Senate with copies of correspondence between the Department of State and George A. K. Morris, or his attorneys, in 1885 and 1886, against the Government of Nicaragua for injuries done to his property by Nicaraguan troops in violation (as alleged) of the rules of civilized warfare, at Amapala, Honduras, in 1883.

HERRERA'S NEPHEWS.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all the papers and correspondence, arranged in chronological order, relating to the claims of Herrera's Nephews for the detention and use of their steamship San Juan, and of Gallego, Messa & Co., for the detention and use of their steamship Tomas Brooks, and the occupation and use of their wharves and warehouses by the military authorities of the United States at Santiago de Cuba in the years 1898 and 1899.

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. HARRIS (for Mr. MORGAN) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,000 copies of Senate Document 253, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, being the hearings before the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that House bill 9206 be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] asked me to yield to him yesterday that he might move an executive session, I was discussing the pending oleomargarine bill, and I said that the opponents of the bill came before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and solemnly protested against what they termed vicious class legislation, which would deprive them of the right to color their oleomargarine in imitation of butter.

As a matter of fact, nine-tenths of those who entered this solemn protest have no right under their State laws to do what they are doing when they thus color their product, and they appeared before the committee as violators of the laws of their own States to protest against the Government doing something that might result in preventing them from further successfully evading State statutes. They made no pretext of being law-abiding citizens, but openly acknowledged that they employed various schemes for the defeat of justice, and some of the food commissioners verify their statements in a manner not at all creditable to those engaged in this traffic.

As a matter of fact, this entire contest is over the right of the manufacturer of oleomargarine to color his product in semblance of butter. This protest of the oleomargarine makers against the tax of 10 cents a pound is a protest that if this measure is passed it will not be profitable for them to longer engage in a traffic that the States, with a few exceptions, have absolutely forbidden through the most stringent laws. They are pleading for what is practically an outlawed business. They come to Congress and say they can successfully evade and beat the laws of the States and those whose duty it is to enforce them, but they can not cope with the United States when Congress places a tax on their outlawed product. Therefore they ask us not to pass this bill, because they will then no longer be able to carry on an illegal business.

Some of our friends from the South have an idea that their people are greatly interested in the production of oleomargarine. It was represented to them when this subject first came up for discussion that something like 55,000,000 pounds of their cotton-seed oil was used annually in the production of this substitute for butter.

Some evidence on this point may be found on page 844 of the hearings before the committee.

But investigation, which was combated by their supporters in the House, revealed the fact that instead of this being the amount used there was less than 9,000,000 pounds employed in 1900, worth less than $500,000, of the total annual output of cotton-seed oil, which amounts to about 1,000,000,000 pounds, worth $28,000,000, as shown by the Twelfth Census. In other words, the interest of the cotton-seed oil producer is about six-tenths of a cent a pound in the finished product, oleomargarine, which displaces, when sold, a pound of butter, which is worth to the producer of the latter article 20 cents. The Southern cotton-seed oil interests are willing, apparently, that the dairy farmer shall be cheated out of a market for $20,000,000 worth of butter per year in order that the cotton-seed oil producer may have a market for less than one-fortieth that amount of cotton-seed oil through an article 75 per cent of which is sold for what it is not.

But even the cotton-seed oil people themselves have not been able to withstand without protest the encroachments of this fraud in their own States. In 1885 the State of Alabama passed a law, approved February 18, which provides that:

No article which is in imitation of pure yellow butter, and is not made wholly from pure milk and cream, shall be manufactured, sold, or used in any public eating place, hospital, or penal institution, etc.; but oleomargarine, free from color or other ingredient to cause it to look like butter, and made in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, is permitted. It must be stamped with its name.

In December of the same year the State of Georgia passed a similar law, providing as follows:

Imitation butter and cheese are defined as any article not produced from pure milk or cream—salt, rennet, and coloring matter excepted—in semblance of butter or cheese and designed to be used as a substitute for either. Every package must be plainly marked "Substitute for butter" or "Substitute for cheese," and each sale shall be accompanied by verbal notice and by a printed statement that the article is an imitation, the statement giving also the name of the producer. The use of these imitations in eating places, bakeries, etc., must be made known by signs.

In 1896 the State of South Carolina passed a law, approved March 9, which provides:

Imitation butter and cheese are defined as every article not produced from pure milk or cream, with or without salt, rennet, and harmless coloring matter, which is in semblance of, and designed to be used as a substitute for, butter or cheese; they shall not be colored to resemble butter or cheese; original packages shall be marked "Substitute for butter" or "Substitute for cheese;" shall not be sold as genuine butter or cheese, nor used in hotels, etc., unless signs are displayed.

And in 1895 Tennessee enacted a law as follows—

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. As the Senator is quoting the statutes of various Southern States as being opposed by their laws to this bogus butter—this axle grease which they sell down there for butter, and all that kind of thing—I should like to ask him why he does not let the State laws apply as to original packages in the first section and leave off the 10 cents a pound tax. If the States are endeavoring to protect their citizens against a fraud, and everybody agrees to it, why not stop with that and simply let the State laws govern, instead of Congress going forward and, as we contend, in an unconstitutional way taxing this thing out of existence?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I anticipated just such a question from the Senator from South Carolina. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in 1886 Congress passed a law fixing a tax of 2 cents a pound on oleomargarine, and so far as the collection of the tax was concerned, the law was enforced in all the States, but it was found impossible under State laws, and even with that Federal statute, to work the color out of oleomargarine. The purpose now is to put a 10 cent tax on it so that oleomargarine which is colored must pay a tax of 10 cents, as it is the only way, in my judgment, by which color can be worked out of oleomargarine.

The statutes of Tennessee on this subject were equally stringent. The law of Tennessee is as follows:

Any article which is in imitation of yellow butter and not made exclusively from pure milk or cream is prohibited; but oleomargarine, free from color or other ingredient to cause it to look like butter, and made in such form and sold in such manner as will advise the consumer of its true character, and other imitations uncolored and labeled with their correct names are permitted; wholesale packages shall be plainly labeled and a label shall accompany retail sales.

Laws of Kentucky, passed in 1898, of Missouri, passed in 1895, of Virginia, passed in 1898, all forbid the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored yellow in semblance of butter, while in the North the only States which have not passed laws on this subject are Rhode Island, Kansas, Indiana, Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana, and in Montana there is a State tax of 10 cents per pound on all oleomargarine.

But let us look into the objections of the opponents of this bill. They are almost wholly confined to the 10-cent tax, and it is loudly claimed that the imposition of this amount will utterly wipe the oleomargarine industry out of existence. They will not for a moment concede that it is possible to sell oleomargarine at all unless it is colored in semblance of butter.

The manufacturers of oleomargarine do not want to be driven to the production of an article that must be sold for what it really is. Their chief argument for its sale to the retailer is that it can be sold with twice the profit obtained through the sale of butter. Now, why should this be? Why should a compound, which is claimed by the maker will keep much longer and better than butter, realize him twice the profit that he can obtain through the sale of butter? Surely not because of the fact of any loss in the handling thereof through shrinkage in values. In the handling of butter the dealer finds that it depreciates in quality if he does not dispose of it promptly.

For this reason he must charge relatively a higher profit on butter, the perishable article, than he exacts from other articles in which there is no risk. Now comes the maker of a product which it is claimed is little less perishable than lard or tallow, and tells him he can make double the profit on oleomargarine that he can make on butter, when, as a matter of fact, such an article should be sold with much less profit. Oleomargarine, because of its composition and cost of production, should rank with lard and cottolene, rather than with a high-priced, delicate article like butter, because the additional moisture or overrun in oleomargarine, amounting to about 15 per cent, will almost pay for the manipulation of the fats and the cost of the milk that is used in it. What I mean is that 85 pounds of neutral lard, oleo oil, and cotton-seed oil, with 15 pounds of milk added, will make 100 pounds of oleomargarine, the milk not costing 10 per cent of the value of the additional 15 pounds of fat.

It is plain that these manufacturers prefer to produce an article that can be substituted three times out of four for a dearer product. This very fact creates their entire demand from the hotels and restaurants. The consumer would undoubtedly soon become educated to the uncolored article, but the manufacturer knows that his best customers, the hotels and restaurants, would be compelled to meet the popular taste and give their patrons what they now ask for and think they are getting—butter—provided they could not purchase yellow oleomargarine at figures that would enable them to serve it with profit, because no man, not even the hotel keepers, practices deceit for the amusement of the thing. It is the profit that is in it.

What is the objection to the uncolored product, oleomargarine, which can be distinguished by everyone? The workingmen who came before our committee said that it would be a blow to their pride to have to eat what looked like lard; that their children would revile them and that they would be held in contempt by their neighbors for serving white butter (or oleomargarine) on their tables. The oleomargarine makers themselves told us that if butter were white that they would have no trouble selling white oleomargarine, but that people would not buy the one white without the other were white also. The butter people tell us, and the oleomargarine people do not deny it, that some of the finest hotels in this country now serve butter as white as it can be made; that it is a fad among certain people to eat white butter, and that the highest-priced butter in England is the uncolored French butter that comes from Normandy. But the oleomargarine people say that the minute butter is white then the objections to white oleomargarine will disappear and that they can sell their goods uncolored without being hampered.

Now what conclusions are we to draw from all these statements and claims? Is not it quite clear that what the oleomargarine people want to do is to build up their business on the reputation of butter? If oleomargarine is a popular article of food among those who consume it why not reverse the order of things and say that if this popular article of food is left uncolored people will no longer consume butter colored; that instead of oleomargarine being dominated by the color of butter why not butter be compelled to follow the color of oleomargarine?

The apologists of oleomargarine say that to forbid its being colored in semblance of butter would kill the industry; that people would not eat it. Do they mean to say that if butter were not colored people would not eat butter? And if they will knowingly take butter uncolored, as they do in the finest of hotels, why not oleomargarine? And does not this bring us back to the same point every time—no matter where we started or from which direction we look at it—that there is no valid excuse, except for the purpose of deception, that oleomargarine should be colored in imitation of butter? Not a single position or argument can be sustained to excuse the imitating of butter by the makers of oleomargarine.

In the first place, oleomargarine has no excuse for artificial coloring. In its natural state it is never yellow, never was yellow, and the yellow color added through artificial means is entirely foreign. And yet its makers claim that this foreign color is the only thing that sells it.

Can anyone mention a single other article of food that depends wholly upon an artificial, unnatural, and foreign color to sell it? It is true many foods are more or less colored. Candies are colored, but not all of them, and none of them colored for deceptive purposes or fraud; and their sale does not depend upon their colors; canned peas are colored, or rather the natural green of French peas is preserved through the addition of copperas. But the result obtained is not a new, unnatural, or foreign color; it is merely the preservation of the original color. Mustard is colored yellow at times, but mustard is naturally yellow, and it is not done to make anybody think it is anything else but mustard. But everybody knows that if nine out of ten consumers knew they were having oleomargarine set before them at the hotels or restaurants as a substitute for butter there would be a row right away. And the makers of oleomargarine know this—

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please let me ask him a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield for a question.

Mr. BACON. Why is it that they can not detect the difference?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Between butter and oleomargarine?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I supposed the Senator from Georgia had had experience with oleomargarine, being a producer of cotton-seed oil, which would have taught him that if he will put oleomargarine, for instance, on a porterhouse steak and undertake to cook that steak with the oleomargarine the tallow in the product will settle on the steak until it is all covered with a white substance; whereas if he puts butter on a porterhouse steak the steak will absorb the butter. Now, if the Senator wants—

Mr. BACON. I understand from the Senator, then, that there is no difficulty in distinguishing the one from the other?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not if a person knows about it—if you know how.

Mr. BACON. If there is no difficulty, then, it seems to me our labor is unnecessary here.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from Georgia has not tried developing this question to a sufficient extent undoubtedly to discover the difference himself. He wants some one else to discover it for him. It is very easy if the Senator will go about it.

Mr. BACON. I did not say there was no difference, but I was simply getting the Senator to the point which he seems to have reached—the recognition of the fact that there is no difficulty in distinguishing one from the other. I understand that it is the sole purpose of this bill to prevent a person from being deceived, and if there is no difficulty in distinguishing one from the other I do not see that there is any danger in that matter.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say to the Senator that there is another way by which he may discover the difference between the two products. If he will put on a table a piece of oleomargarine, no matter how pure it is, and a piece of butter, placing them side by side, during a warm day, he will discover at once which is oleomargarine and which is butter. He will discover that it will be necessary to put a piece of ice on the butter to preserve it or to keep it from melting, while the oleomargarine will stand up for all time.

Mr. BACON. The Senator still continues to add to the argument to show that there is no difficulty in distinguishing between the two. That is the point I am after. He keeps on piling up the evidence of the fact that there is no difficulty in distinguishing between the two, and yet I understand the sole purpose of the bill is to prevent the people from being deceived as to which is one and which is the other.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I should not undertake to convince the Senator from Georgia. He ought to know; but all people do not know how to distinguish between the two products. I was saying, Mr. President, that the makers of oleomargarine know this, and for that reason want to keep that yellow color in for the purpose of concealing the identity of the article so it will go into consumption without protest. For this and for no other reason—the disguising of their compound—do they desire to keep the color in it.

What do the courts say of this plea—that the coloring of oleomargarine is for the purpose of making the article more palatable? The learned jurist, Mr. Justice Harlan, in his opinion in the Plumley case, handed down in December, 1894, in which it was held that the law of Massachusetts forbidding the sale of oleomargarine when colored in semblance of butter was a valid exercise of the police power of the State, said:

Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter—

And I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this opinion in the Plumley case. I think it answers his peculiar question:

Now, the real object of coloring oleomargarine so as to make it look like genuine butter is that it may appear to be what it is not, and thus induce unwary purchasers who do not closely scrutinize the label upon the package in which it is contained, to buy it as and for butter, produced from unadulterated milk, or cream from such milk. The suggestion that oleomargarine is artificially colored so as to render it more palatable and attractive can only mean that customers are deluded by such coloration into believing that they are getting genuine butter.

And this conclusion is only too plainly apparent to anyone who reasons the thing out.

Are we particular as to the color of jellies we spread on our bread? Do we send back graham bread because it is not the color of the white bread we have been accustomed to eat? Do we call for rye bread and then refuse it because it is black? Do we expect when we get rye bread or whole-wheat bread that it is going to look just like the white bread we are accustomed to eat? We eat these articles for other reasons than their effect upon the eye. And when we go abroad and are served with butter as white as can be made, do we do as the oleomargarine makers claim would be done in the case of oleomargarine, reject it because it is not yellow?

The truth of the whole matter is that oleomargarine is made from tallow, lard, and cotton-seed oil. When it is not disguised with coloring matter its identity is revealed. It does look like lard when uncolored, because lard predominates, the fat content being about 45 per cent lard. People do not relish eating lard on their bread, and are prejudiced against it, and the oleomargarine makers know that they will not eat it so freely when they know what it is. Therefore the desperate effort to disguise the character of the compound and force it upon the people against their will or through their ignorance.

You will say that butter is colored. That is a fact; but the coloring of butter deceives no one. The yellow color in butter has been its trade-mark for centuries. Butter is naturally yellow except for a few months in the year. It is seldom if ever dead white, and very frequently and almost wholly, in summer the fine hotels that demand white butter must have it bleached in order to satisfy the fastidious taste of their guests. Nobody ever heard a complaint because somebody sold colored butter. The color in butter is in no wise indicative of its quality. The charge that butter is artificially colored in winter to make it look like rich summer butter falls to the ground in absurdity when it is known that in winter this same summer butter is worth from 3 to 5 cents a pound less than butter which is freshly made. People do not want summer butter in winter. They want it fresh, and if they thought the yellow color indicated that the butter they bought in December was made in June they would not buy it, and the coloring would be a detriment rather than a benefit to butter.

Why is butter colored? For the sole purpose of maintaining a uniform shade. Changes of weather, and of feed and the changed conditions of the cow, which do not affect the quality of the butter fat so far as the palate or nutritive value is concerned, do affect the color, and the product of a dairy is likely to be one color one day and another the next. The use of an artificial coloring preserves a uniformity that is demanded in the markets. It is either necessary to color up to one shade of yellow in winter, when the product of the dairy is lightest, or bleach the butter white in summer to keep it of a uniform color the year around. It is a matter of convenience. If all butter could be white the year round, the trade and consumers could be educated to that color in thirty days. It is not the color, but uniformity that is sought, and the color that can be kept uniform the year around is the end to be attained.

With the oleomargarine makers there is no necessity for any artificial methods of keeping their product uniform in color. Cottonseed oil, lard, and oleo oil are the same color the year through. Without the use of coloring matter they can get a uniformly colored product, and can soon, if they desire to spend the money and time to do so, build up a trade for their uncolored product that will supply everybody who really wants oleomargarine as a substitute for butter. Other manufacturers of food have had to pay out money advertising and popularizing their articles. A little magazine advertising, setting forth the merits of uncolored oleomargarine and comparing its qualities with butter, would be beneficial, no doubt, as it has been to other food products. There are no prohibitions upon the sale of uncolored oleomargarine in any State, and it can have a free trade with the tax reduced to a mere trifle under the measure now under consideration.

The Government in 1886 undertook the regulation of this oleomargarine traffic, and thereby admitted the inability of the States to cope with the fraud. The law of 1886 has not been successful. Can Congress now refuse to so modify or amend that act that it will give the people the protection that it has undertaken? And in doing this should not Congress make some recognition of the policy of the States in handling this question, and would it be right for us to tear down the laws they have enacted when they come to us for assistance in their enforcement? Should we enact legislation in conflict with their laws, when their officials have had all the experience there is in the regulation of this traffic? Should we go counter to the judgment of every State official who has had experience in the prosecution of cases under the various laws, and ignore the protests and appeals of the united dairy sentiment of the country?

Mr. President, the most active opponents of this measure until recently, apart from the manufacturers of oleomargarine themselves, have been the live-stock associations and their officers. We have seen this opposition only through these associations, there having been no petitions presented to the committee, so far as I know, signed by individual live-stock growers. There may have been a few letters from individuals.

It appears from investigation that the growers of live stock have been led to believe that the passage of this bill means a loss of anywhere from $2 to $4 per head on their fatted steers. The resolutions of the National Live Stock Association, passed at Fort Worth, Tex., two years ago, claim a loss of from $3 to $4 per head on the fat of a steer, as shown on page 78 of the printed testimony. In its resolutions, as printed on page 185, the National Live Stock Exchange says that the loss will amount to $3 per head. The Kansas City Live Stock Exchange recites the fact that the loss will be an average of $4 per head, as shown on page 72; and the basis of the opposition of the Kansas City Commercial Club's opposition to the bill, as shown in its resolutions, printed on page 62, is that it has been represented that there will be a loss of $2 per head on cattle. The South St. Paul Live Stock Exchange calls the loss from $3 to $4 per head, as printed on page 57.

That these figures are unreliable and without foundation was clearly shown, we believe, by Hon. S. C. Bassett, president of the board of agriculture of the State of Nebraska, who appeared before the committee in behalf of this measure and showed in figures and facts that were not questioned or disproved that only about 44 cents' worth of beef fat is used for oleomargarine made in this country from each animal slaughtered. His evidence is printed on page 451, and I read the following extract as embracing the vital points thereof:

A neighbor of mine who annually feeds large numbers of cattle for market, after reading this statement, said to me: "If that statement be true I certainly am opposed to your Grout bill."

Gentlemen of the committee, as I understand this matter, this statement is not true, and neither by statistics nor otherwise can it be shown to be true. Statistics published by the United States Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, show that at 41 packing centers the number of cattle inspected before slaughter was 4,654,842. Outside of those inspected by the Department it is estimated that enough more were slaughtered to make the aggregate number slaughtered for the year, 5,000,000 head.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to Congress in May last shows that in all the 83,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine manufactured in this country last year there were but 24,491,769 pounds of oleo oil used. This at 9 cents per pound has a value of $2,204,253, which sum divided among the 5,000,000 head of cattle who produced this oleo oil makes an average of 44 cents per head.

In some cases this product is priced at 10 cents per pound, but I think that is unjust from a producer's standpoint, for the reason that at 10 cents a pound oleo oil is a manufactured product into which labor, etc., goes, and on which profit is realized, but the man who markets the cattle does not receive 10 cents a pound for it, and I have used the figure 9 cents, which, in my judgment, is a proper estimate. No one believes or for a moment seriously contends that if this oleo product used in the manufacture of oleomargarine could not be so used it would be a total loss, and lessen by the sum of 44 cents the average amount received by the owners of cattle for each animal sold for slaughter. But suppose it needs be sold at the price of other fats—5 cents per pound—it would mean a mere nominal loss of 20 cents on each animal sold for slaughter, which sum every owner of live stock well knows is hardly given a thought when his stock is being disposed of for slaughter at packing centers.

Mr. Bassett also showed (p. 452) that of the 43,891,814 head of cattle owned in this country 28,825,933 were owned in the States prohibiting the sale of yellow oleomargarine, while but 15,065,881 were owned where its sale is permitted. And in closing his remarks, as shown on page 453, Mr. Bassett said:

I do not wish to discredit the National Live Stock Association before this committee, but in its appearance here it does not represent either the wishes or sentiments of the very large majority of the farmers and stock raisers of my State. It undoubtedly does represent the sentiment of the packers, commission men, owners of live stock on the ranges, and like interests, but it does not represent the sentiment of our farmers and dairymen, who are by far the largest raisers and owners of live stock.

When I say "owners of live stock on ranges," I have reference to that class of men who own large interests in live stock.

In support of this statement, Mr. President, I have since had placed in my hands a petition signed by a large number of live-stock growers of the State of Nebraska protesting against the action of the National Live Stock Association in its antagonism of the measure, and indorsing the same in the strongest terms.

Secretary Wilson was invited to appear before your committee and give his views of the Grout bill. Mr. Wilson is himself a stock farmer, and his Iowa farm is largely, if not wholly, given to the growing of beef cattle for the markets of this country. The following is taken from the testimony on page 418, and can be relied upon, I believe, to be a true, impartial, and expert statement of the matter:

Senator ALLEN. Have you inquired into the effect the passage of this bill will have upon the value of animals raised for food purposes; not for dairy purposes?

Secretary WILSON. Very carefully.

Senator ALLEN. What will be the effect of the passage of this bill on that class of animals?

Secretary WILSON. I tried to reason that in my short paper which I have read. There is a little oil furnished by cottonseed people, and a little by the people who grow steers; but the old-fashioned steer that had lots of fat in him is not the steer that is used to-day. The young beef, under 2 years of age, put into the market and prepared for the shambles, is not an animal that produces much body or intestinal fat. That is the animal that is wanted to-day.

The old-fashioned steer that was 3½ years old before he got to market had a large amount of fat, running up in some cases to 150 and as high as 180 pounds.

Now, then, the tendency in the South, where they have destroyed the lands by perpetual cropping, and the tendency west of the Missouri, in the semidry belt, where they are destroying the grazing lands by injudicious overgrazing, is to take greater interest in the dairy cow than in the steer, and in the case of settlers who want to raise families out west of the one hundredth meridian the interest grows every day on behalf of the dairy cow, and with regard to the production of steers east of the Missouri River on the farms there is no comparison whatever. The small amount of fat from cattle that commerce calls for in making oleomargarine is infinitesimal in value compared with the injury that the growth of this bogus industry will inflict upon legitimate agriculture that requires a dairy cow.

And the following is an excerpt from the printed testimony on page 425:

Senator DOLLIVER. I received a telegram from a cattle dealer in Iowa stating that this bill was likely to very greatly damage the value of beef cattle.

Secretary WILSON. Yes; he does not know what he is talking about, that same cattle dealer.

Mr. President, from what I have stated here in respect of the interest taken by the growers of live stock, it will be observed, no doubt, that the Live Stock Association have heretofore, as we all know to be true, opposed any legislation of this character. But some of the members of the Live Stock Association have recently seen new light; they have been thinking of this question; they have been studying it; and some of them, at least, have come to the conclusion that it is better for them as an association to keep out and allow Congress to do what it thinks best in a matter of this kind. In proof of that I desire to quote from a letter recently written by Mr. H. F. McIntosh, who is the editor of the Nebraska Farmer and a member of the executive committee of the American Cattle Growers' Association, which met at Denver in Colorado, I think, on the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th of the present month. In that letter Mr. McIntosh says:

The executive committee of the American Cattle Growers' Association brought in and recommended for adoption the Fort Worth resolution opposed to the Grout bill. I immediately made a motion to lay this resolution on the table. This motion was voted down. The question then recurred on a motion to adopt the resolution. I presented what seemed to me to be the leading objections to taking action on this resolution, and when the vote was put a considerable majority of those voting were found to be opposed to the resolution. * * *

I may say, in addition to this, that the Nebraska Stock Growers' Association, reported in the Nebraska Farmer, had a large attendance and is made up of all the leading range cattlemen in Nebraska. The American Cattle

Growers' Association, which met at Denver, is a strictly national organization of range cattlemen, and it has a membership of about 450 individuals. The association is not made up of delegates from corporations or other organizations, but represents exactly the opinion of men engaged in growing cattle on the plains.

In another letter, dated at Omaha, March 13, 1902, Mr. McIntosh says:

Inclosed I send the original copy of antioleo resolution introduced at the Nebraska Stock Growers' Association meeting, and which was tabled, as Secretary Van Boskirk's letter, attached, shows. This was received since my report of the meeting was sent you.

This same resolution was presented at the Denver meeting of the American Cattle Growers' Association, with the result reported fully in the Rocky Mountain News and all Denver papers of March 7, 1902.

So, Mr. President, some, at least, of the stock growers' associations are changing their views on the question of the feasibility and desirability of legislation such as we now propose.

Now, a word as to the charge that the object of the 10-cent tax is for the purpose of taxing a legitimate industry out of existence. What is a legitimate industry? Can you call an industry that has been condemned by the legislatures of 32 States as one that shall not be permitted to do business in their borders a legitimate industry?

What could be more illegitimate than an industry that has been forbidden by more than two-thirds of the States, with more than four-fifths of the population of the United States?

Is it not straining a point to call such an industry legitimate? Certainly this is a new definition of the word, and if colored oleomargarine, outlawed by 32 States, is legitimate, it would be difficult to find anything illegitimate. And these laws have not only been universally upheld by the courts, but oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter has come in for judicial condemnation by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, with which decision almost everybody who has studied the question is familiar.

But to go back to the question of taxation. It may be true that the tax of 10 cents per pound would deprive some few who desire to purchase it of the privilege of buying colored oleomargarine at the prices that it can now be bought as oleomargarine. But what are the objections of consumers to uncolored oleomargarine? The representatives of the workingmen who appeared before your committee said it was a matter of pride. They didn't want people to see them have white oleomargarine on their table. They did not claim that the color added to the palatability of the article, or to its nutritive value. It simply permitted them to conceal its identity from their neighbors and children.

On the other hand, the thousands and millions of people who do not want oleomargarine at all, but are having it palmed off on them as butter at butter prices every day by the retail dealer, and are being cheated out of millions of dollars every year, are to be considered, and there is a large class of people who are defrauded at the hotels and restaurants, and who have under present conditions or under the substitute offered by the minority no protection whatever. Then there is what is of as much importance, the defrauding of the dairyman out of his market for the butter that the great majority of people desire. These dairymen are imposed upon by those who substitute oleomargarine and charge butter prices.

Now the question is, Which side has the best claim to protection, the man who appeals for colored oleomargarine to be permitted to go upon the market in guise of butter in order that he may not be compelled to color it for himself, or the classes which appeal for protection from fraud, deceit, and injury and probable demoralization of their business? In weighing the evidence your committee has twice come to the conclusion that inasmuch as the only demand for the color in oleomargarine is a matter of very small convenience to its limited number of conscious consumers, and that it is the color and the color alone which makes the fraud possible in the open market and at hotels and restaurants, the tax of 10 cents per pound is defensible upon the ground that it is a tax which would strike at fraud and would not come out of the consumer, but, if paid, would be paid by the one who should pay it—the man who makes the compound in such a manner that it is used to defraud the public.

Oleomargarine has no competitor. Its field is as wide as the universe. Let it take off its mask and say, "Here am I, white as the first flake of snow, pure as a freshly plucked orange, wholesome, digestible, without artifice, purged of all deceit," and there will be no trouble, Mr. President, about a market for it. With such a label upon it people will be convinced that it is an article full of merit, and the demand for such an article will be unlimited and world-wide.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw the substitute offered in the minority report and to insert in its place the one which I now send to the desk.

I wish to say that the substitute in the minority report was not intended to be there and was placed there inadvertently. In the collection of papers my clerk got the wrong substitute and inserted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi for the withdrawal of the substitute which appears in the views of the minority and substituting therefor the amendment in the nature of a substitute now submitted by the Senator? The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the proposed substitute be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey,	Depew,	Lodge,	Pettus,
Bard,	Dillingham,	McComas,	Platt, Conn.
Bate,	Dolliver,	McCumber,	Platt, N. Y.
Berry,	Dryden,	McLauren, Miss.	Proctor,
Blackburn,	Fairbanks,	McLauren, S. C.	Rawlins,
Burnham,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Scott,
Burrows,	Gibson,	Mallory,	Simmons,
Carmack,	Hale,	Martin,	Stewart,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Millard,	Taliaferro,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Culberson,	Jones, Nev.	Money,	Tillman,
Cullom,	Kean,	Patterson,	Vest,
Deboe,	Kearns,	Perkins,	Wellington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am unable to discover any principle of legislation which would warrant the passage of such a measure as this. It seems to me designed to destroy one legitimate industry for the benefit of another without a qualifying circumstance. The only argument against oleomargarine is the coloring. It is admitted that it is healthful; that it is useful; that it is clean; that it possesses all the qualities of good butter so far as results are concerned; that it is good in every way; and nobody claims otherwise.

This measure is not to protect the people against some insidious poison; it is not to guard against an alleged evil; but its sole object is to destroy the industry. It even goes so far as to impose a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent a pound on oleomargarine if it is uncolored. The first section of the bill makes a statement which would deprive three-fourths of the people of the United States of any butter. It says:

That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State, etc.

Now, how much of the butter in the market does anybody suppose is made of pure and unadulterated milk or cream? There is very little; probably not more than 5 or 10 per cent. There is probably more disease occasioned by dairy products than by any other article of food.

If we can rely on the reports of experts in nearly every important city in the United States and Europe, about one-half the deaths among children are occasioned by unclean dairy products. The cities of Paris and New York are to-day in great commotion on account of the deadly results of poisoned milk and cream. I will insert in my remarks some articles and reports on this point. I am aware that dairymen are making considerable effort to remedy this alarming evil. If the attention of Congress were directed to protecting the community from deadly poison in dairy products instead of an effort to destroy a sanitary and wholesome product because it is in competition with unclean butter, some good might be accomplished. There is some yellow butter at a certain season of the year.

In Northern climates a rich, nutritious grass, fed on by cows, will produce yellow butter for a month or two in the early season. This will certainly not exceed 1 per cent of the butter sold on the market. I remember very well when two or three counties of northern New York prided themselves on the production of yellow butter, which was quite a fad for a time in New York City. The popularity secured for yellow butter during the season of this fad induced the dealers in butter to color their white, dirty-colored butter yellow, until the butter dealers have educated the whole community that butter to be good must be yellow.

Anyone who is familiar with the country store where butter is gathered in from small farmers which in its natural state could not be sold for consumption, but which is bought with store pay, sold to butter dealers, washed and perhaps churned in butter-milk, and then colored to imitate the best butter in the market, will appreciate the want of cleanliness in ordinary butter and why thousands of children perish every year from the microbes in the butter they eat. This universal practice of dealers in coloring their butter has led the mass of the people to believe that the natural color of butter is yellow. They do not know that the practice of coloring was inaugurated to conceal the unwholesome appearance of microbe butter.

Afterwards the discovery was made that butter could be produced quite as palatable and equally nutritious as the best butter made from cow's milk, but it could not be made yellow any more than the ordinary butter in the market without resorting to the same process of coloring used by the butter dealers at large.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not butter.

Mr. STEWART. I know it is not butter from a dirty farm stable.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not cow's butter.

Mr. STEWART. It is not unclean, unwholesome, microbe butter. It will not poison children. It would not shock the consumers to know its ingredients, as they would certainly be shocked if they witnessed the process of producing butter at a large portion of the dairies of this country. If the Senator from Wisconsin will visit some of the dairies that produce butter, he will have a strong stomach if he does not desist from the use of milk and butter for a time at least. The cry is for the protection of microbe butter, which may kill, and often does, against a perfectly clean and healthful product. In many respects oleomargarine is better for use than any cow's butter. The millions of miners, manufacturers, and mechanics throughout the country can not use to any considerable extent cow's butter. They can not afford to keep refrigerators and buy ice to keep butter cool, and must therefore dispense with the use of cow's butter during warm weather. Such butter melts down and becomes unfit for use in a few hours unless preserved with ice. This fact accounts for the preference of the great mass of laboring men for oleomargarine butter, which will not become rancid or melt down in warm weather.

But the advocates of microbe butter say that we will only tax you one-fourth of 1 cent a pound on your oleomargarine butter if you will allow us to have a monopoly of coloring our butter, which could not be sold for any purpose in its natural color. There is no doubt that the coloring of cow butter is a wrong, because the deception enables the dealer to sell poison under the trade-mark of clean butter. Why should butter dealers complain that the coloring they use to sell clean as well as unclean butter should be adopted by oleomargarine vendors to sell an article the cleanliness and wholesomeness of which has not been questioned?

The principle at the bottom of the bill is wrong. There is no justification or excuse for the vendors of colored cow butter, which may or may not be wholesome, to protest against the sale of oleomargarine butter which is admitted to be wholesome. Why should the millions of laboring men be deprived of buying a cheap and healthful product to allow butter dealers to sell without restraint a dearer product in much of which lurks deadly poisons?

The discovery of oleomargarine butter was most beneficent. It provided for the poor a product that could be kept without large expenditures for ice, containing no poison, at a price which the laboring masses could pay. If the butter dealers will allow this bill to be amended so that no coloring matter shall be used for either cow butter or oleomargarine and apply the taxation and punishment to the sale of cow and microbe butter as well as to oleomargarine, the community might have some protection against the unclean methods of butter dealers.

If the policy to tax one industry for the benefit of another is to prevail, why not tax the growers of oats for the benefit of the farmers who raise barley and corn? And the growers of cotton for the benefit of the growers of wool? There is hardly a fabric in ordinary use which does not contain some material which it does not profess to contain.

It is not the business of government to legislate against wrongs which do not exist or to destroy legitimate industries. No wrong is done the community by the sale of oleomargarine, because it is a healthful and nutritious article of food.

I do not propose to elaborate this matter. The fact that this legislation is aimed against a clean, wholesome, good product in favor of a product which may or may not be clean condemns it. Coloring matter is used by the manufacturers of oleomargarine to pander to a taste for yellow butter created by the dealers in cow butter, to sell unwholesome butter and deceive the community. Strip all butter of coloring and the price of oleomargarine will be higher on its merits than the average price of cow butter. The producers of cow butter and microbe butter are carrying this war against a legitimate industry too far. The time may come when unclean dairy products carrying deadly poisons will be excluded from the markets.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I would not venture to ask anybody to listen to me on this bill if it were not for the fact that for many years in the other House of Congress I had some modest connection with the legislation which had for its object the prevention of the adulteration of cheese and flour and other agricultural products; and while the subject is rather a lowly one from some standpoints, it has nevertheless become, in my humble judgment, one of the pressing and important questions with which we have to deal.

I was very much interested in the discourse delivered here yesterday by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and I regret that in stating the object of this measure he failed altogether to get the standpoint of those who have felt an interest in the passage of this bill. His idea seemed to be that the object of this measure is to suppress the legitimate industry of manufacturing oleomargarine, whereas in truth the object of this measure and the only object which it has is so to amend the oleomargarine act of 1886 as to more effectually prevent the imposition which has been practiced upon the community in the manufacture and sale of imitation dairy products.

That statute levied a tax of 2 cents a pound on oleomargarine and provided means for identifying the article in the market place. It was thought at the time to be adequate for that purpose, and would have been in all probability if its promoters had not deliberately chosen for their industry a career of lawlessness and false pretenses. At that time the annual production of oleomargarine was comparatively small, and few people could be found to eat it if they knew it, but since then the number of factories has greatly increased, the chemical processes of its manufacture have been vastly improved, and the annual output multiplied beyond a hundred million pounds.

If those who have invested their money in the business had chosen to deal in good faith with the community, observing the act of Congress and the laws of the States in which three-fourths of our population live, no additional legislation would have been necessary. But year after year this business has played into the hands of men who have nullified the act of Congress in every particular save only the payment of the tax, and have trampled under foot the local enactments of 32 States in the Union; all for the purpose of selling its product to those who are unable to distinguish it from butter.

The result of this is that the business has become fraudulent through and through, and unless its promoters are willing to cooperate with the lawmaking power, State and Federal, in the effort to lift it above the general reputation of a cheat at common law, the time will come, however many millions are invested in it, when it will be unfit for the countenance of any honest man.

Before I go any further I will point out what this bill proposes to do. The first section subjects original packages of all imitation dairy products entering any State through the channels of interstate commerce to the police regulations of that State in respect to such articles. This section is drawn for the purpose of preventing people in one State from sending these articles into another under conditions which exempt them from the operation of the laws of the State to which they are sent.

There was a time when most lawyers would have said that whenever an article of commerce enters a State it becomes immediately subject to the police powers of that State, for the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the license cases of 1847, notably the case of Pierce et al. v. the State of New Hampshire, reported in 5 Howard, would appear to settle the right of any State to fix the status of articles of commerce brought into it from another State.

But at the October term, 1889, that ancient landmark of our jurisprudence was removed by the opinion of the court in the case of Leisy v. Hardin, reported in 135 United States, page 100. That case arose in the State of Iowa. The legislature of Iowa, in its discretion, had prohibited the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within its borders under the usual penalties of seizure and condemnation.

The firm of Leisy & Co., citizens of Illinois, transported to Keokuk original packages of intoxicating liquors and undertook to sell them there notwithstanding the statutes of Iowa in such cases made and provided. They were seized by the constable of the township, and in an action of replevin to recover them the supreme court of Iowa held that they were in all respects subject to the laws of the State.

The case was brought here on writ of error, and the Supreme Court, with a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan, in which Mr. Justice Gray and Mr. Justice Brewer joined, held that the liquors in controversy being articles of interstate commerce, had not, when sold for the first time in their original packages, so commingled with the common stock of goods subject to State jurisdiction as to feel the weight of State laws intended to prevent the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

This decision of the court would undoubtedly have produced universal confusion in every State where the law had undertaken to subject the liquor traffic to police regulations, whether by license or prohibition, if Congress had not promptly acted upon a suggestion of the Chief Justice, repeatedly made in the decision, in which its right is recognized to permit by express enactment the exercise by the States of the power to interfere by seizure or any other action with the importation or sale of goods brought in by foreign or nonresident importers.

Acting upon this suggestion, the original-package law of 1890, applicable only to intoxicating liquors, was passed—a law since fully sustained by the court in Re Rohrer (140 U. S.)—and the first section of this bill repeats verbatim the language of that law, extending it to include the imitation dairy products with which we are now concerned. I regard the first section of this bill, therefore, as an important step in the direction of effectually managing the oleomargarine question.

It will be observed that the committee has struck out an amendment added by the House. We did that for two reasons. In the first place it is not necessary and therefore of no value, and in the next place it is ambiguous and therefore likely to produce controversy. Without the amendment nobody will be constrained in taking oleomargarine into States where the law permits its sale, provided the tax is paid, while with the amendment left in a question of construction may arise in which the rule of uniformity in the levy of taxes may be invoked to invalidate the whole statute.

I found great pleasure in urging the committee to leave it out because I heard the advocates of oleomargarine boasting that they had secured an amendment in the House which, while innocent in its appearance, would operate to cripple if not to nullify the statute. So much for the first section.

The second section extends the definition of the words "manufacturer of oleomargarine" so as to include everybody who sells it for money. It does not include those who are in possession of it for their own use. So the bill enables the purchaser, the poor workingman, who seemed to disturb the feelings of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] so much, to buy the article in its natural appearance and color it to suit himself, a thing which was shown to the committee to be very much more simple in the economy of the household than the somewhat complex process of salting mashed potatoes, for example.

But the bill extends that definition so as to include boarding houses, dining cars, hotels, restaurants, and everybody who handles the article for the purpose of disposing of it to others.

The next section of the bill may be described as the battleground of the controversy. It increases the tax on oleomargarine from 2 cents to 10 in case the article is colored in imitation of butter, and it reduces the tax from 2 cents to a quarter of a cent in case the article is put upon the market without an artificial coloring which brings it into the similitude of butter.

The final section of the bill is administrative—concerns only the relations of wholesale dealers to the Treasury Department.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] undertook to state the purpose of the bill, and I am afraid that, without intending it, he did so with a certain lack of that fairness which usually characterizes his utterances here. He said that it was the object of the bill to kill the oleomargarine industry.

I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the object of this bill, if I have understood it correctly, is to put a stop to an abuse which has long existed in the American market place—an abuse which has worked a very special hardship upon a great agricultural industry of the country, and in a lesser degree upon the whole community.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to state to the Senator that I did not intend to impute any dishonesty of purpose to the members of the committee particularly, but I quoted the men who are here urging the bill and whose pockets are interested in the result, who declared before the committee and are in print to the effect that they intended to exterminate this industry, and if this bill did not do it they would come with another. That was the reason why I said it was the object of the bill to extinguish the industry.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not desire to raise any personal question with my honorable friend from Mississippi, although I could not help being somewhat impressed with the cheerful way in which he stated that this bill would receive a majority of the votes cast in the open Senate, but would be left with only a bare dozen if a secret ballot could be had.

Mr. MONEY. I want to say to the Senator that since I made that statement I have had assurance on the other side of the House that that is the case.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not wish to get the Senate into such a controversy as any further pursuit of that subject might involve. I desire, however, by the kindness of your attention, to discuss this question both from the standpoint of the American farm and from the point of view of everybody who takes an interest in the integrity of the market place itself.

What is oleomargarine? My friend from Mississippi gave a beautiful and classic definition of it yesterday; a definition very valuable in this discussion, when he pointed out that it is derived from a word signifying pearl, and that it means a pearl-colored oil. It was the invention of a French chemist, who, in 1869, I think, under the patronage of the Government of Napoleon III, found a way to remove the fat of beef from its cellular tissue by the action of carbonate of potash under a temperature of 115° F. and then by hydraulic pressure to separate the stearin, leaving a neutral residuum of oil.

That product he churned in milk and water, and after a careful washing it was ready for use. The process was a very simple one, and produced an article nutritious and in a degree wholesome, which could be used as a cheap substitute for butter, but did not deceive anybody on account of its similarity.

Very soon the formula fell into the hands of enterprising persons both here and in other countries, who set out to produce an article so nearly akin to butter chemically as to need only a few unscrupulous commercial arts to convert it into the most elaborate swindle that has ever been contrived against the rule of square dealing among men.

The originators of it did not at first perceive the actual possibilities of the swindle, for the industry passed through stages of development so crude, both in the materials employed and in the methods used, that for many years it needed the surveillance of the board of health rather than the attention of the legislature.

Indeed, if a man will go through the debates which accompanied the oleomargarine act of 1886 he will see at once that the chief ground of complaint against the article was based upon the natural repugnance that men everywhere feel toward articles of food suspicious in their appearance and doubtful in their origin.

The tax of 2 cents a pound would in all probability have totally wiped out the business if the managers of it, in order to save its life, had not taken two steps—one in the right direction, and the other in a direction which, whatever may be the fate of this bill, will leave it one day outcast and discredited everywhere in the United States.

They set out by the aid of science to remove from it all elements deleterious to the public health; and for the purposes of this debate, though for no other purpose, the claim need not be disputed that the oleo factory of to-day at its best is able to produce, and if the hope of unnatural profits were taken away would uniformly produce, an article of food which, whatever its merits as a substitute for butter, would at least give rise to no questions of mere sanitation and hygiene.

I do not go quite as far as my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who intimated yesterday that in his judgment the article is unhealthy. I do not know whether it is or not, although I am convinced that if it produces any diseases at all they are likely to be chronic in their character and such as might be expected to arise from a gradual impairment of the human system. I heard a gentleman say the other day—a colleague of mine from the Fifth Congressional district of Iowa, Representative COUSINS—that he had examined the subject with very great care and he found only one real difference between oleomargarine and butter, and that difference a mere question of time, a question of twenty-four hours, butter having the peculiar property of melting in you in the same day.

I do not know whether that covers the whole case or not; but for the purposes of this argument, though for no other purpose, I am willing to concede that oleo in its best estate is no longer subject to the suspicion which, twenty years ago, made its most reputable headquarters mysterious with the secrets of the garbage plant and the soap factory. I make this admission freely for the purposes of this debate, reserving only the right of further inquiry under proper guidance as to where the visible supply of oleo oil, now known to pass annually through the channels of our commerce, domestic and foreign, actually comes from.

Unfortunately, even yet the manufacturers of oleomargarine seem to hesitate about taking the public into their confidence. There is a little book bearing the title of Facts about Butterine, presented with the compliments of William J. Moxley, a leading manufacturer of the goods in Chicago. Now, you would expect to find in a book like that a statement of what the article is made of.

It gives the composition of butter on the authority of those who have analyzed it, but says nothing about oleomargarine except that it contains a fraction less of acids, leaving the impression upon the mind that this shortage is intentional in order to make the goods more acceptable to the popular taste. We are not, however, without the means of finding out what the thing is made of, and we can not fail to admire the ingenuity with which the oleomargarine trade has inveigled into its defense the various industries which supply, or are said to supply, its raw materials.

Mr. John H. Garber, an expert special agent of the Twelfth Census, has just finished his bulletin upon the oleomargarine industry, and in the course of that bulletin he gives exactly the composition of the three grades of oleomargarine known to the trade. If you will let me, although I hate to do it, I will read what he says:

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MONEY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator—

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not object to the Senator's interruption.

Mr. MONEY. Except that as long as he is on that line I beg to call his attention to the report made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury, the report for 1900. He gives the table in full here of the ingredients of oleomargarine. The Senator will find it on the eighty-eighth page of Mr. Springer's argument, if he has it there.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am familiar with that. I read this simply because it appears to me that the expert examination made by the Director of the Census would probably be more accurate than the analyses of specimens by people who are not familiar with the business connected with the Internal-Revenue Department of the Government.

Mr. MONEY. The report the Senator read, if he will pardon me, was made by a special employee of the Census Bureau.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I so stated.

Mr. MONEY. The other was made by the Internal Revenue inspection department. I had supposed each one of them to be charged with the duty of finding out exactly what it was. But I do not intend to interrupt the Senator to set off one table against the other, by any means, or to make any conflict of authority on that point; I simply direct attention to the fact that there is a variation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I recognize the slight variation, but I have felt more security in Mr. Garber's report, in view of his expert knowledge of the oleomargarine industry, than I would feel in an Internal Revenue report, even if the Commissioner had signed it himself.

Now, what will be the effect of this bill upon this article? It will have no effect at all unless it induces the manufacturers in preparing these goods for the market to leave out the coloring matter, and in the highest grade to leave out that admixture of butter or other ingredient which by reason of its natural shade would be likely to dominate the appearance of the finished product. It gives to these manufacturers, with the tax reduced almost to nothing, the whole field of supplying the world with a cheap substitute for butter, and takes away from them only one opportunity which they now enjoy—the opportunity of filling the channels of a long-established trade in the United States with an unlimited output of bogus merchandise.

Now, what will be the effect of this bill upon the manufacture of this product? Will it go on as at present? The framers of this bill think not, and for this reason: The addition of 8 cents a pound to the retail price of the goods brings it up so near the usual price of butter as to take away altogether the temptations of the trade to mislead its customers as to the character of the article; for after all the least tolerable feature of the oleomargarine swindle is its habitual assumption of the price of butter as well as its appearance. In fact the fraud could not exist if it did not do that.

If a householder found himself buying creamery butter, everywhere known to be worth 30 cents, for 15, he would instantly perceive that there was something the matter with the transaction, just exactly as a man would be put on his guard if he was offered a Perfecto cigar for a nickel. Therefore this assumption of price goes side by side with the oleomargarine business. The trade itself understands this perfectly, for I find here preserved in the hearings before the committee a circular letter by the Capital City Dairy Company, of Columbus, Ohio, in which they distinctly point out the importance of selling their prime butterine at 25 or 30 cents, and also suggest that they have mixed packs or country rolls always in stock.

This means that they are preparing for the market in the State of Ohio not only an imitation of the color of butter, but of the humble efforts of the country housewife to put it up in packages, noticeable on account of the limitation of her situation. They deliberately copy the infirmities and defects incident to her situation, and then send peddlers, dressed as farmers, through the streets of the cities of Ohio selling this article as genuine butter.

The other day I was in the city of Cleveland and I found there a universal turmoil going on about the discovery that everybody was eating oleomargarine. The courts were getting in action and indictments were being found, and the food commissioner of the State, in an interview printed in an evening newspaper, said "that most of the oleomargarine cases are cases of peddlers who rig themselves up as farmers" and proceed to peddle this butter through the streets of that city. I have no doubt that the same business is going on all over the United States. I know that it is going on in the city of Chicago, which is the headquarters of this swindle in the United States.

I have here [exhibiting] the sign of one of the leading oleomargarine grocery houses in the city of Chicago, which was presented in evidence before the Senate committee at the last session of Congress: "Try our best Elgin creamery butter; five pounds for a dollar." The gentleman who secured the sign asked for butter and got oleomargarine, though there was none for sale in there for less than 25 cents a pound.

The other day, in order just to satisfy myself as to whether this business was still going on, I caused to be purchased in the city of Chicago, of a very famous butter dealer there, who never had a pound of real butter in his place, a little package of butter, and I have it here unopened. [Exhibiting.] Everybody in the Senate will remember what the provisions are of the oleomargarine law of 1886 as to the marketing of this product. There is a package of the article, and I intend to exhibit to the Senate the skill with which that law is nullified.

I will unwrap that package and tell you in advance that it is marked in plain letters "Oleomargarine." I would be willing to contribute something to the happiness of any Senator in this Chamber who will within five minutes discover the mark upon that package. In order to have the business well and faithfully attended to I will ask my friend from the State of South Carolina, which has the most stringent laws on this subject of any State in the Union, to try to find the mark "Oleomargarine" which the law of 1886 requires to be written upon the covering of that package [handing package to Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you mean this package?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Yes; the outside wrapping paper.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is the wrapper in which the grocer gave it to you?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Exactly; but the law of 1886 requires this mark to be made upon the wrapper. It will engage any man's ingenuity to discover it, although if he knows exactly how that business is practiced in the city of Chicago, and removes all the folds around the imitation butter, he might before nightfall find the word "oleomargarine" printed in dim letters on the package.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator leave the package on my desk because he wants me to get introduced to this article?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I hope to introduce the Senator to the genuine goods before I am through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to say to the Senator that a couple of years ago I was in the town of Elgin, and they gave me oleomargarine at the hotel table. I recognized it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. You recognized the goods?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is supposed to be the leading dairy market in the West.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the Senator will remember that this retail grocer, who never had a pound of butter in his great establishment, advertised in his windows "New Elgin butter."

Mr. TILLMAN. Why do you not try him?

Mr. DOLLIVER. He has been in the courts half the time in the last five years, but he never got in without finding at his side the attorneys of the oleomargarine manufacturers and their representatives ready to sign his bail bonds. I see by the Chicago newspapers of yesterday that he is in court again, along with about 15 or 20 other slippery gentlemen there.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I fear that the Senator in his good nature has been imposed upon by my interruptions.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. MONEY. Since the Elgin creamery has been brought in, are you quite sure that the oleomargarine dealer when he advertises Elgin butter was not giving it its proper name?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think not—

Mr. MONEY. I should just like to say, then—

Mr. DOLLIVER. As will be developed in the course of my remarks, I have not that supreme confidence in these manufacturers which the Senator from Mississippi manifested here on the floor yesterday.

Mr. MONEY. I have not a bit more confidence in them than I have in the butter men, but I desire to say that a very high and responsible gentleman, and very high in the Republican party, told me he went to market here to get pure butter, made a little scarce by this investigation. He went to the principal butter man in town and asked him, "Do you sell oleomargarine?" He said, "No; I do not; I sell butter, but I can take you to a man who sells oleomargarine." He asked him, "Where do you get your butter?" And he said, "I get it from the Elgin Creamery." The gentleman happened to be the correspondent or agent here of the Armour Company, and he told me the Elgin Creamery was the biggest customer Armour had for the butterine which the retail dealers are selling us.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not want to get into a side controversy with the Senator from Mississippi. His remarks only indicate the bewildering mystery of the business with which we are dealing. I have personally gone into at least a score of stores on a single street in the city of Chicago and stood there as an observer while the workingmen, whom my friend from Mississippi was disturbed about yesterday, were asking for butter and carrying away with them, at the price of butter, a spurious article which they did not come there to buy.

Of course it is too much to expect a dealer, whether in Washington or Chicago, when he has once embarked upon piracy like that, to reduce any of his margins as a voluntary concession to the rights of anybody else. The only way to break up a nest like that is to reduce to a minimum the profits of the rascality, and I will say to my friend from Mississippi that if the 10-cent tax proposed in this bill is not sufficient to do that he will find me ready to vote to make it high enough to accomplish that result.

What, then, does this bill leave for these manufacturers to do? It leaves them to put upon the market the article which they are making in its natural color. It leaves them still at liberty to copy the smell of butter by capturing and colonizing our microbes and permitting them to starve to death in an unfriendly environment. They may simulate the taste of butter, but this bill will require them to give to me and to you and to everybody else at least one unmistakable and authentic way to find out what kind of a lubricant we are actually spreading upon our bread.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then will the Senator be ready when he sees a white article in the market to declare that it is oleomargarine?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That will certainly make it easier to locate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does not the Senator know that during eight months of the year you can not get yellow butter?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Like my friend, I ought to know something about butter. Out in our part of the country, where cows are fed on nutritious food, we manage to get up a little color all the year round.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very little, however, during the winter months.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But I do not intend to waste the time of the Senate in taking lessons to-day on the subject of what the color of butter is if I can help it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to intrude on the Senator unless it is agreeable to him.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. TILLMAN. If white becomes the flag of oleomargarine and yellow becomes the flag of butter, I simply want to know how you are going to keep the people from being deceived by white butter?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is impossible to entirely avoid that difficulty; but if any misguided man should be entrapped into buying good butter when he is looking for something in the nature of oleomargarine I think he is entitled neither to the Senator's sympathy nor to mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. If, on the contrary, you get something that is not good butter, but is colored in imitation of good butter, as oleo is said to be artificially and fraudulently colored, thus deceiving the customer, would that have the Senator's indorsement?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not at all. I agree entirely with the suggestion made here yesterday by the chairman of the committee in respect of all falsifications of butter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator vote for an amendment forbidding the coloring of genuine butter—good butter?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not?

Mr. DOLLIVER. There is no reason why I should do so. Cow butter has been colored from time immemorial.

Mr. TILLMAN. By what?

Mr. DOLLIVER. By everybody who has been engaged in making it. At certain seasons of the year, as my friend says, it falls off from the natural color.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose when the cow herself can not color it, it is permissible to color it?

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is permissible. That has been the practice for many years, and I know of nobody who has been wronged by it.

Mr. President, if the operation of this bill results as we hope it will, instead of doing the manufacturers of oleomargarine an injury, as the Senator from Mississippi seems to think, in point of fact we would be doing them more good service than all the attorneys they have ever employed and all the witnesses that have filled the courts of 32 States with the atmosphere of its disrepute; for the way in which this business is now managed, notwithstanding its investment of millions, has made it a defendant in the criminal courts of nearly every State in the Union.

As the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] said a moment ago, the testimony of those who have spoken before the Senate committee in behalf of labor revealed the fact that this article has attached to itself the badge of a disgrace so complete that even among the mining villages of Pennsylvania it is impossible for anybody to call its name in a store without running the risk of social ostracism and reproach.

Not even the modern liquor traffic at the point of its worst degradation has ever lived in such a storm of indictments and motions for a new trial. This article, so far as its manufacture and sale are concerned, has been put under the ban of the law in nearly every State in the Union; and yet the business out of its unjust profits has gone steadily forward, executing the most far-reaching conspiracy that we have ever known in the United States against the administration of justice.

The law's delays in thousands of cases pending all over the United States; organized relays of hired attorneys carrying their thumb-worn briefs from one court-house to another, leaving behind them the trail of appeal bonds and assignments of error; jury fixers in all the stages of moral decay; professional witnesses graduated in the arts of perjury—these, and such as these, are the influences with which the food commissioners of 32 States in the Union have for years been waging an almost hopeless conflict.

They have come before the committee of the Senate charged with this business, and as they have told us—faithful officers of the law, as they are—their story of this unequal warfare, I have not permitted myself to doubt that if the managers of these misguided commercial enterprises are looking for a fight to a finish with the American farm, they will be accommodated by the allied agricultural industries of the United States.

But my friend from Mississippi says, Why do you emphasize the wrong of the manufacturers when the fraud belongs altogether to the grocery trade? Why do you, on account of this unseemly carnival of petit larceny in the retail stores, want to disturb the happiness of the noble band of men who are engaged in this industry and who are turning out upon the tender mercies of a very cold world these 100,000,000 pounds of wholesome and nutritious food product?

I wish I could take the view that my friend from Mississippi takes. I wish I could acquit these manufacturers of the misdeemeanors which are now being committed in their name; but the evidence in this case prevents me from doing that, because I find that these reputable gentlemen, standing a little in the background, are even now guiding the course of this traffic, are offering their counsel and their money and their help to everybody who gets into the pitfalls of the retail oleomargarine trade, and are following to-day with vigilant attention the covert and devious passage of this article throughout the whole market place.

What is the evidence of that? Fortunately the evidence is clearly upon record. If you will open the little volume containing the hearings, you will find stated in the circular of the trade itself the origin of these retail frauds. It may be said that the whole scheme of committing the color fraud has been perfected under the direct guidance and supervision of these reputable manufacturers for whom my friend was so eloquently speaking only yesterday; and in order to show that I will read this circular, dated Chicago, April 5, 1899, and signed by a leading manufacturer of these goods there.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.

Inclosed find a color card, which is as near the color of our butterine as the printer's art can represent. Our aim is sending you this card is to aid you in selecting the proper color suitable to your trade.

Not a palatable color that would be cheerful to the eye, as my friend said, but "the proper color suitable to your trade."

Mistakes are easily made, but hard to remedy.

There is a profound truth.

In nearly every section of the country there is a difference in the color of butter, and even in certain seasons of the year there is a change—

These people seem to be onto this, if the Senator from South Carolina will take note of this language—

In certain seasons of the year there is a change, as you will have noticed. In winter butter is of a lighter color than in summer. In many sections this is the result of the difference in feed or pasture.

This man seems to be familiar with that aspect of suburban life. He continues:

We can give you just what you want at all seasons if we know your requirements. As an example, No. 1 has no coloring matter; No. 2 has a little coloring, and so on to No. 8, which is the highest colored goods we turn out. Preserve this card, order the color you want by number, and we will send you just what you want.

It is in vain for these reputable manufacturers to cry out that they are being persecuted simply because they put upon their product a palatable and cheerful color. If that is so, what does it mean when these trade circulars go out advising and exhorting their customers to watch the changing color of butter in particular markets and at particular seasons of the year?

But my friend from Mississippi says they have the same right to color their oleomargarine that the butter manufacturer has to color butter. I deny it. They are without the legal authority to do it in 32 States of the Union, and they are without the moral right to do it anywhere in the United States. Why? Because the coloring of butter, whether the practice be good or bad, misleads nobody, wrongs nobody, injures nobody; whatever its color, it is still butter and nothing else. The maker of it in adding a harmless vegetable dye to his product at those seasons of the year when the natural color of butter differs from the bright yellow produced by green pastures, modifies, in a way of which nobody can complain, the appearance of the article, without in any way disturbing the rights of anybody else.

I hope to see the color fashion of butter so changed as to no longer require a resort to this cheap device; but if that good day should ever come the literature of the oleomargarine business contains ample evidence that its promoters, as the Senator from Mississippi candidly admitted yesterday, would follow such a change with a skill so perfect as to perpetuate the scheme which they have been working for twenty years. The thing I protest against is not the coloring of oleomargarine, but the selling of it in the market under the false pretense that it is butter, and this bill strikes the color only because it is the instrument of that crime.

I have not come here as an adviser of these 27 oleomargarine factories scattered here and there over the United States, but I will say to them—and I wish my voice could reach the ear of some worthy and honest man connected with the business, which has in it to-day an investment of more than $3,000,000—if my voice could reach the men engaged in this business, I would say to them that I am a better friend to them than those in Congress or out who would counsel them to go on trying to perpetuate the license which they are now enjoying to prey upon the entire community.

Already the demand for oleomargarine in its natural color is seen in the markets of the United States, and it has long been seen in Denmark, in France, in Holland, and in Italy, and it needs, in my judgment, only the encouragement of a moderate integrity—only a moderate integrity—to increase to the proportions at least of a decent commerce.

There must be something fatally wrong about an investment that spends more of its time dodging police than it does in the other departments of the business, and I for one hope the time is come when we shall have in the United States a state of things such as exists in Denmark to-day. If that time should come, it would at least make this business respectable, whether it remained profitable or not.

I do not therefore agree with those who think that the enactment of this law will disturb for any length of time the manufacture of a suitable substitute for butter, made in its own likeness and presented to the public on its own merits in a legitimate way. It is on account of this belief that I have listened without alarm to the representations that have been made before the Committee on Agriculture of both Houses of Congress in behalf of great interests which are said to be threatened by this measure.

If it operated to entirely extinguish the oleomargarine business by shutting up these factories, I would not even then have very much fear on account of any damage to American agriculture; for those who have given the profoundest thought to the problems of the farm are united in the opinion that the dairy stands for more in all sections of the United States than all the interests that contribute to the oleomargarine trade added together.

In the last session of Congress the Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the Senate committee at their request. It is no disparagement of others to say that he stands to-day unapproached in his own country and unrivaled in any other country of the world as a student of the questions with which the farm has to deal. And not the least of his qualifications for the great work which he is now doing is his talent for surrounding himself with men who, like Major Alvord and his young assistant in the Dairy Division, Raymond A. Pearson, have become independent workers and constant contributors to the sum of the allied sciences to which they have devoted their lives.

No man can doubt his devotion to the interest of the American farmer, whether on the scattered quarter sections of the Mississippi Valley, or in the region where cotton was king, or on the remote frontiers where the cowboys, watching over their herds, take their first lessons in the curriculum of the strenuous life.

While Secretary Wilson was making his statement to the committee on the occasion to which I have referred, a telegram was handed to me from a dealer in my own State saying that this bill was likely to very greatly damage the value of beef cattle. I took occasion to read the telegram to the Secretary in order to get his opinion about it, and without hesitation he answered in these words:

He does not know what he is talking about, that same cattleman.

He showed that the total amount of beef fat used in making oleomargarine is, in the nature of the case, so insignificant as to find no expression in the market price of cattle.

But under his brief statement was a suggestion still more important than that, for he pointed out that the days of the range herd are numbered, as the Senator from Mississippi himself admits, and that the very life of that business even now depends upon the individual homestead, with its bona fide settlers, and the creamery near at hand.

I can not help admiring the success of the oleomargarine industry in putting itself into partnership with the Stock Growers' Association, and I can easily understand the satisfaction with which one of its chief spokesmen, in a letter which I have had an opportunity of seeing, congratulates the contributors to the oleomargarine campaign fund that in securing the services of the attorney of the Stock Growers' Association they had acquired a standing here which an undisguised oleo barrister could never have secured.

I claim not only the right to speak, but I exercise an official duty in speaking for the live-stock industry of a State that is first in swine, first in beef cattle, and first in the production of milch cows. Our people can not be shut out of a first-class live-stock association or any other well-regulated institution. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. They raise a pretty good crop of politicians out there.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Maybe that is so. There is a little pork fat which in the form of neutral oil is used in making oleomargarine, and nearly everybody in Iowa is raising pigs, but nobody wants to sell them for butter, so far as I have ever heard. Some fat of beef is used, and nearly everybody in Iowa is raising steers, magnificent specimens, tracing their ancestry through the herd books of the Old World, but you never meet anybody there who wants to sell them for butter.

With hogs so corpulent that we have to put casters under them to move them around the feed yard [laughter] and shorthorns that balance the weight of a ton on scales at Chicago, I have heard from only one man who appears to think that the live-stock industry has anything to gain by crippling the butter trade of the United States; for that whole community long ago learned from the counsel of James Wilson that at the threshold of all permanent agricultural prosperity stands the cow with her calf by her side.

More grotesque even is the effort of the oleomargarine partisans to enlist in their support the cotton belt of the United States on the theory that this bill, by wiping out oleomargarine, cuts off an important cotton-seed market. That is an argument put forth with only the dimmest comprehensions of the facts. Little or no cotton-seed oil is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine and none at all except in the cheapest grade. There are several reasons for this. In the first place, no possible refinement of cotton-seed oil takes away from it entirely its characteristic taste. I do not say that the taste is unpleasant or disagreeable, only that it is peculiar, and no article desiring to enjoy the undisturbed experience of butter in the market can afford to carry with it the taste of cotton-seed oil.

Besides that, cotton-seed oil resumes its liquid state within the temperature which butter is called on to endure. Therefore any considerable admixture of it softens the product, not indeed past the point of use, but past the point of keeping up the appearance of butter. For these two reasons incidentally pointed out in the Census bulletin to which I have before referred, the employment of cotton-seed oil in this product has wholly disappeared except in the cheapest grades; and the only possible way to reinstate it in the chemical formula of oleomargarine is to bring back the business to its legitimate channels, since in its masquerade as butter it is compelled, in order to keep its disguise on straight, to part company with cotton-seed oil even in its most refined forms.

But if it were true as some have claimed that the oleomargarine factories have opened a great and growing market for this product, there are two far-reaching reasons which ought to disassociate the cotton fields from this lawless invasion of the rights of the American dairyman. The cotton belt gets more money by the sale of cotton-seed meal to butter-producing States than it does from the sale of cotton-seed oil to the oleomargarine factories, many times over, so that, from the purely business point of view, it has an interest far more distinct in the prosperity of the dairy farm than in the scandalous programme of its enemies. If our friends of the South want to get the riches of cotton seed into butter why not put it in by feeding the animal, because she has within the only chemistry that can assimilate that product.

Beside that, as Secretary Wilson stated before the committee out of the abundance of his wisdom and his undoubted good will toward the South, the redemption of its worn-out fields must come from the widest variation in their tillage, combined with such specialties in production as have made the modern creamery a universal and unfailing sign of thrift and wealth.

There are almost unnumbered reasons why the State of Mississippi, for example, distinguished on this floor by the public services of my friend and colleague on the committee, should have as much interest in the dairy as the State of Vermont, in which our honored chairman pursues the quiet tasks that belong to country life. I venture to predict that within twenty years the States of the Middle South will be the center of the butter-making industry of America, and that the children of its present representatives will be laughing at the folly of their fathers, who for the sake of selling a few gallons of cotton-seed oil are lending the influence of their honored names to the most destructive fraud ever devised against American agriculture.

Mr. BATE. I beg to say to the Senator from Iowa that we are moved by a principle in this matter and not that we may make a few dollars by the sale of cotton-seed oil. I am sorry the Senator has made such a reflection. I can not believe he means it—

Mr. DOLLIVER. I make no reflection. On the contrary, it is inspiring to know that the representatives of any section of the country for the sake of principle are willing to sacrifice so much.

I have so far spoken mainly of the rights of the people at large to be defended against the adulteration and falsification of their food. If this is not the most important aspect of the oleomargarine question, it is at least the aspect which invites the attention of the most people, for it can not be denied that we live in a time when greed and avarice have filled the world with a thousand plausible inventions intended to deceive and rob the unfortunate and the unwary.

Neither the clothing that we wear nor the food we eat has escaped the strategy of the counterfeiter. Wherever we go and whatever we buy, we are not for a moment free from the uneasy feeling that we are likely to be entrapped and fleeced on every hand. And if this measure, dealing with the most conspicuous swindle of them all, shall operate to deliver our market place from this notorious offense against sound morality, it will be a notable step in fulfillment of the law of self-protection, which in nearly every country except our own has become part of the general code of civilized life.

Even those who like to eat oleomargarine have a right to know what they are eating, and those who are just able to stand it when they can not afford anything else are entitled to have it served in such a way that both the price of it and the looks of it will put them on their guard as to its actual character. A free people ought not to be asked to surrender the right to know what kind of a dose is being administered to them. The American people have done nothing to deserve such a fate.

In the course of his joint debate with Job, Zophar, the comforter, undertakes to show the state and final portion of the wicked. Curse after curse he utters as he tries to reach an adequate statement of their misfortunes. "He shall suck the poison of asps, and the vipers' tongues shall slay him." But that is not all; the climax of loss and penalty is not yet reached. It is no sudden retribution; no swift judgment from the skies. He hastens to present it to the imagination of the afflicted patriarch. "He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter." Not even the brooks. A pictorial way, obviously, of saying that the worst thing that can happen to a man is to be sentenced to eat glucose and oleomargarine all the days of his life. [Laughter.]

Much has been said in the course of this controversy—and just now reiterated by the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr.

STEWART]—intended to disparage the butter trade by pointing out the conditions of negligence and filth which are said to surround farm life in the United States and which result in making butter an undesirable and even dangerous article of diet. I do not recognize the necessity of defending the home life of the American farm against these contemptuous comments. They have no application to the great butter-producing communities of the United States, and I do not believe that they describe conditions existing, certainly not above the line of abject poverty, even in the most remote backwood neighborhoods.

And I have not been able to listen to those sneering descriptions of dirt and destitution surrounding the old-fashioned family churn without going back in my own memory to the cellar doorway of an humble farmhouse yonder among the mountains of West Virginia, where, in the shadow of climbing roses, with a spring of living water at hand, colder than ice and clearer than crystal, I took my turn in counting the strokes which at length brought forth the yellow luxury, which waited only the sleight of patient fingers to transform it into a work of art and beauty.

"Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter," said the royal sage of Israel, ages ago. I do not believe that any butter brought forth by the methods mentioned in the Scriptures ever did the world any serious harm. The market has an unerring way of measuring its value by its quality and condition, so that the incentive is always present to correct its faults by care and labor. It always has been true, and is still true, that those who make bad butter eat the most of it themselves, and therefore the general market never has had and does not now have anything more than a sympathetic interest in the subject.

I am aware that in recent years means have been invented to renovate grades of homemade butter not before available. But whatever may be said against the sale of renovated butter, one thing must not be overlooked—it is butter. Surely the churning of milk has brought it forth. I do not believe that it appears in the butter market under any subterfuges of the trade. It is bought for cooking and for other immediate uses. It does not bear the price of butter of the first quality, and no merchant with a fixed place of business seeks to deceive his customers in its sale.

It reveals its character to the senses, and if its taste does not betray it the first day its smell will the next. It can not hide itself. Therefore it stands upon the counters on the butter market in its true character and at its true price. Some people like it, others tolerate it, while others reject it altogether. In some tropical markets it finds great favor, being consumed in a melted form like the goat butter of the ancients, of which Pliny says in the twenty-eighth book of his natural history, "The more rank it is in smell the more highly it is esteemed."

The mere reworking of butter to cleanse and solidify it and to give it uniformity of color and specific gravity can arouse no reasonable complaint. But if it is true, as the evidence appears to show, that in recent years the butter market has been invaded by goods heretofore unmerchantable, collected into factories and resurrected by questionable chemical processes in order to remove the evidences of decay, there can be no objection to putting such a business under the same supervision with which we propose to surround the sale of oleomargarine.

The House of Representatives, in the bill before us, made an effort in that direction. That amendment your committee struck out, not for the want of sympathy with the purpose in view, but because the House amendment contained no definition of renovated butter and provided no effective machinery for approaching the subject; and at the proper time it is the purpose of your committee to offer an amendment more completely covering that subject. I assent to this, not because I believe it involves in any appreciable degree the rights of the public, except in so far as sound commercial policy ought to encourage thrift and enterprise, leaving goods hopelessly unmarketable without profitable access to the channels of the trade.

My friend from Mississippi seemed to find it against this bill because it is intended really to help the farmer. I do not mind confessing to my honorable friend that I, for one, do not regard it as necessary to conceal the fact that the American farmer has probably more interest in the suppression of these abuses than anybody else.

A country like ours, which not only feeds itself but stands ready to answer calls for bread and meat and all other food from every part of the world, does not need to apologize for a vigilant national policy guarding the welfare of the farming population. Whatever intrudes upon the privileges of the farm, disturbing its business, limiting its opportunities, and wasting its ancient estate, is a proper subject for notice even in the Senate of the United States.

There are 30,000,000 people in this country living upon farms, actually making their homes, bringing up their families, going about their daily business in the midst of the surroundings which were described here by the Senator from Nevada as a miserable landscape of squalor and disease. They are not alone in their miseries, because they have sent out the best vigor of their blood into every center of American energy to win the prizes of the great professions, to master the problems of national life, to conquer the mysteries of the arts and sciences, and to win the laurels of all great achievements.

Not very long ago the late President of the United States crossed the State of Iowa with a distinguished party on a train which carried him into the Northwest, where he went to receive the returning volunteer regiments of the Philippine army. There were present with him in the car all the members of his Cabinet, the governors of several great States, and nearly a score of Senators and Representatives, all of them famous and honored in the public life of these times.

As they were all sitting one morning in the smoking car, just after an early breakfast, everybody noticed the President laughing benevolently to himself as he watched the antics of two boys who appeared to be warming their feet by the roadside in a place, a sort of oasis in the desert of frost, where an old cow had been lying down all night; and turning to his company, the President said, "Gentlemen, do you know that one of the most delightful recollections of my boyhood is the solid comfort of the experience that those boys are now having, warming frost-bitten feet in the place where cows had been lying down?"

Turning to his company, he said: "I wonder how many of you here have had the same experience." One after another the members of his Cabinet gave in their experience. My honored colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa, was present upon the occasion and heard every member of the Cabinet bear the same witness, beginning with John Hay, who did his foot warming partly in Ohio and partly on the prairies of Illinois, and ending with James Wilson, "Tama Jim," as we affectionately call the Secretary of Agriculture out in Iowa, who did his on the heather in Scotland. Everyone gave the same testimony, and one after another all the governors and the Senators and Representatives of great States followed, every one of them bearing the same witness, a manly testimony to the recollection of the luxuries of their own boyhood.

I heard a man say the other day that he was surprised that a few milk dealers could get the attention of the Congress of the United States, as they evidently have had it on the oleomargarine question. He seemed to think they did not amount to anything. He made one mistake in his calculations. He did not count the reserve corps, for when the old homestead calls for volunteers in its defense, millions of men and women are ready to answer the call as they go back again to the far-off happy days when, after sundown, boys and girls together, with laughter and with song, they followed the procession through the barnyard gate as the cows came home. And so gentlemen need not be surprised that an attack like this, carried on for twenty years against American agriculture, has excited a little attention even here in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, the American farm, whatever my friend from Nevada may say, whatever the learned Senator from Mississippi may say or think, asks no advantage over its competitors if you will give it a market place that is on the square. We have no fear of competition that is straight. We do not believe that the natural fruits of the earth's bounty are ever going to be cast away to make room for the secrets of the laboratory or the patent rights of the chemist.

We have no anxiety—none at all—for fear the simple bill of fare which Abraham and Sarah set before angels from heaven at the very dawn of history as they held a picnic together under a friendly tree will ever lose its place in the menu of civilized man. [Laughter.] We have no fear of that. But if I have interpreted the resolution of the farmers of the United States correctly, very interesting events are in progress.

The Senator from Nevada complains that they are counterfeiting one thing. Other gentlemen complain that they are counterfeiting another. I serve notice on the whole race of counterfeiters that the day of reckoning with public opinion in the United States is at hand.

It used to be thought that the cow jumped over the moon. That was not true. It used to be said that the dish had run away with the spoon. That was a harmless fiction of the nursery; but if the little dog will keep his eyes open he will see some interesting exercises yet [laughter], for if I have interpreted aright the purpose and the resolution of the American farmers, they do not intend to permanently allow a horde of sneak thieves to follow them through the streets of cities, here and abroad, forging their trade-mark, purloining their profits, and degrading their merchandise in markets where it has been respected through uncounted centuries.

The American farmer does not come here to beg anything. He makes a plea here directly to the sense of fairness and of justice, never absent from the American character. He prays for nothing. He pleads nothing. He does not ask Congress to give him anything. His appeal here is a petition of right; and representing 2,000,000 of them, now hopefully going about their spring work, sorting their seed corn between the great rivers which throw the arms of their loving kindness about the Commonwealth of Iowa, I desire to thank you for the patience and attention with which you have listened to the inadequate statement which I have made of their case in equity against the oleomargarine fraud. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask what the amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning in line 10, it is proposed to strike out the proviso, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid any State to permit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in any manner consistent with the laws of said State, provided that it is manufactured and sold entirely within the State.

Mr. PROCTOR. As I suggested on Monday, I think it would be better to leave these amendments until the time that may be fixed upon for a final vote arrives. I am not aware that there is anybody wishing to go on this afternoon. If there is, I shall be glad to have him do so. There is plenty of time. If there is no one who wishes to go on, I suppose it is an indication that there is very little more to be said, and I would suggest that it would be well to fix a time for taking a vote on the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill. I ask to have it read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which he asks to have read and printed. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment, in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by Mr. CULBERSON to H. R. 9206, entitled "An act to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State," etc., as reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with amendments. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine,' approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows:

"Manufacturers of oleomargarine shall pay $900 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

"Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein; but a manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own production only at the place of its manufacture in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $48 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein. And sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section, and to the persons upon whom they are imposed: Provided, That in case any manufacturer of oleomargarine commences business subsequent to the 30th day of June in any year, the special tax shall be reckoned from the 1st day of July in that year, and shall be $500.

"SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word 'Oleomargarine' in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers and marked, stamped, and branded with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed thereon in distinct letters, and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word 'Oleomargarine,' with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2-pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps.

"Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine otherwise than as provided by this act, or contrary to the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made in pursuance hereof, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who shall sell or offer for sale, as butter, any oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, or who falsely brands any package, or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for the first offense not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and for the second and every subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than sixty days nor more than two years.

"Sec. 6a. Renovated butter is butter produced from inferior, cheap, old, sour, unmerchantable, or rancid butters by washing, mixing with milk, cream, or other milk product, rechurning, recoloring, reworking, melting, chilling, or by any or all of such processes combined, or by any other process. That upon renovated butter which shall be manufactured, made, and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer or maker thereof, and any fractional part of a pound shall be taxed as a pound. The tax levied by this section shall be represented by coupon stamps, and the provisions of existing laws governing the engraving, issue, sale, accountability, effacement, and destruction of stamps relating to tobacco and snuff, as far as applicable, are hereby made to apply to stamps provided for by this section. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection to be made from time to time, and at such times as he may deem necessary, of all factories and storehouses where butter is renovated; and all butter renovated at such places shall be carefully inspected in the same manner and to the same extent and purpose that meat products are now inspected. The quantity and quality of butter renovated shall be reported monthly. All renovated butter shall be designated as such by marks, brands, and labels, and the words "Renovated butter" shall be printed on all packages thereof, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be sold only as renovated butter. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful sanitary and other rules and regulations for carrying this section into effect. And no renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from one State to another or to foreign countries unless inspected as provided in this section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask a question in regard to one of the proposed amendments to the bill.

Mr. PROCTOR rose.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Vermont desires to speak I will not interrupt him now.

Mr. PROCTOR. No; I did not rise to speak. I rose to ask for an agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I will not interfere with the Senator's request for an agreement. I will make my inquiry subsequently.

Mr. PROCTOR. No one seems ready to speak this afternoon. I suppose that is an indication that there is very little more to be said on the subject. So far as those who favor the bill are concerned, we are entirely ready to vote now. The minority of the committee expressed themselves as ready to vote to-morrow afternoon, but others seem to want a longer time. I shall be glad if some reasonable agreement can be made about a time to vote. Then we should all know what to calculate upon.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I should like very much myself to contribute to the pleasure of the Senator from Vermont, who I know has an engagement which he desires to meet and which will require him probably to leave for a while. But it is impossible for me to represent this side of the House in a matter of this sort. I find several gentlemen here desirous of speaking on this question, and they are not yet prepared to do so on account of the press of other matters which have been demanding their attention. I do not know that anyone is ready to go on now. I could take the floor myself, if necessary, but I do not particularly want to monopolize the discussion.

The distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is preparing a speech, and I should be glad if he could be heard. The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] desires to make a speech, but he is not ready to go on this afternoon, and he does not know that he will be prepared to go on to-morrow.

I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that this matter be dropped until these gentlemen get ready to present their views to the Senate on this important question, and in the meanwhile there are other matters waiting which can be taken up, and the Senator can return, if he wants to leave now, and call up the measure when he gets back.

I wish to repeat that personally I am very willing to come to any accommodation that will suit the convenience of the Senator from Vermont, but I am not authorized to do so for anybody, and I find that objections will be made on this side.

Mr. PROCTOR. This measure has been on the Calendar now for over a month. Of course that was equivalent to notice that it might come up at any time, and it has been the regular order of business since last Friday. On Good Friday we probably shall not be in session, and that will afford a leisure day for preparation. I think it would be unwise to lay aside the measure. I shall be glad to give a liberal, fair time for debate. Thursday was thought to be agreeable to the minority of the committee as a time for taking a vote. I would suggest the coming Saturday.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Vermont very frankly that no day short of Monday will be considered upon a request for unanimous consent. As stated by the Senator from Mississippi, it is my purpose to address the Senate upon this question. Up to this time I have not begun even the necessary preparation, consulting statistics, and I have not examined until at my seat to-day the opinions of the Supreme Court touching the powers of the States and the powers of the Federal Government over this question.

I have no intention of preparing or attempting an elaborate speech. Indeed, I have no intention of preparing a speech at all; but I do intend to make one. I will not be ready to proceed before Monday; that is practically certain. I will say this much to the Senator from Vermont, that after those of us who desire to speak have spoken we will be ready to take a vote. There is no disposition to interpose objections or to delay the consideration of this measure or the vote upon it.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am very glad to learn that the Senator from Texas is going to favor us with a speech. It will surely be interesting and able. We all know his facility in preparation and force in delivery, and I am very glad to agree to postpone the time for a vote until Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock and to agree that he shall have all the time Monday that he wishes, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. BAILEY. No, I would not think of agreeing to that arrangement, because I feel that there are other Senators here who desire to speak and who would be permitted to speak with my consent, even if it displaced me. I think rather than to undertake a definite agreement it will answer the purpose if the Senator from Vermont will announce that he will endeavor to obtain a vote at 4 o'clock on Monday. That will be sufficient notice to bring all the Senators here who desire to be present, and if there should happen to be on either side of the Chamber any Senator who has not spoken and who desires to discuss the measure, I think the Senator from Vermont would not press a vote under those circumstances. If there is no one then still desiring to speak I assure him that we will not attempt to delay the vote. I speak for myself. Of course I have no authority to speak for anyone else, but I am sure that is the feeling on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, there have several Senators spoken to me to the effect that they are very anxious on account of other engagements and going away to have a definite time fixed. I would suggest to the Senator, to insure ample time, that we make it Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. It seems ungracious, after the very kindly reference of the Senator from Vermont to me, to persist in an objection, but I believe it is impossible to reach an agreement about this matter now, though I do not believe that it is altogether impossible to reach a vote on Monday, or on Tuesday at the most.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to say one word with reference to what the Senator from Vermont said as to the expectation that we shall adjourn over Friday. I believe that has been the custom for a good many years now, and I think it would be the desire of many Senators to adjourn also over Saturday if we are to be absent on Friday, so I think that when we adjourn on Thursday we ought to adjourn until Monday. I mention it now so that there may be no misunderstanding on that point.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that a Friday and Saturday recess would enable those of us who, in the press of other matters, have not been able to make any kind of preparation to prepare for the discussion on Monday, and, then, surely if the bill does not occupy the time of the Senate longer than Monday and Tuesday, I imagine that a vote can be reached on Tuesday. For myself I might be willing to have that understanding, but I could hardly consent that there should be a unanimous agreement to that effect.

Mr. PROCTOR. To vote on Tuesday?

Mr. BATE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. Some of us here want in that time to appear before the Committee on Commerce. We have, including Friday, but three days. A great many amendments have gone in, and we shall be required to appear before the committee in that time. So I think it would be a good proposition to adjourn from Thursday until Monday.

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not quite understand the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. I said that I think it would be a good idea to adjourn over on Friday and Saturday. A vote on Tuesday evening would be agreeable as far as I am concerned, but many Senators on this side, five or six of us, at least, will have to appear before the Committee on Commerce on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont, I will state that this is a very important question involving very large interests and involving much more than the right of a great many people. The debate only began on Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and it has been very short. I do not believe that there ever was so short a debate on a matter so important as this.

I had not thought of Friday as Good Friday before, but it seems to be impossible under the circumstances for those who desire to speak to prepare themselves in the time named. I had also forgotten what was mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee. I must spend some time on the reports of the engineers, because of the matters coming before the Committee on Commerce to-morrow relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Nearly all the Southern members I understand are to appear before the committee, and they must necessarily be engaged in preparing themselves for arguments that they will submit to that committee. That is an exceedingly important matter for them.

I regret that the personal convenience of the Senator from Vermont compels him to urge such prompt action on the bill, although I am not averse to giving it. I think if he would allow the matter to go until Tuesday, that then we can take a vote upon it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Would the Senator be willing to agree to unanimous consent for a vote on Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. PETTUS and others. No.

Mr. MONEY. I would say yes, but I hear "no" all around me, so that I cannot do it. That was my intention, but I hear "no" all around me, and I presume that gentlemen will not permit me to speak for them in that regard.

Mr. PROCTOR. On account of what has been said to me by several gentlemen who wish to know, I would be very much pleased if some day could be named.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I think this is too early a date to fix any period for a vote on a bill like this. The discussion commenced on Monday and I do not see any necessity for any great haste about it. I should like to accommodate the Senator in charge of the bill as far as I could possibly go, but I do not think that we ought to fix a time at all now. I think we ought to have time to discuss the bill fully.

Mr. PROCTOR. So far as I have heard expressions on this side, Senators favor an adjournment over from to-morrow night until Monday. That will give two days, to say nothing about the first day of the week, for preparation, and I will agree to the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas. I will not ask for a vote before Tuesday at 4 o'clock, and I will rely upon his expression that he will try to be ready before that time.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply disclaim any right to speak for others who may not be prepared. I shall be prepared.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, it is my purpose at some time to make a few observations regarding the pending measure, and as there seems to be a lack of Senators who are prepared to proceed I will be glad to proceed in the morning, if the Senate will please.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say a word or two on the bill now.

Mr. QUARLES. Very well. I understand that my distinguished friend from Massachusetts is prepared to say something upon the bill at this time. To-morrow morning, after the routine business, I shall be glad to occupy a little of the time of the Senate.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I should like to know what is the exact understanding concerning the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there is no understanding at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to debate the bill, but as I am to be absent after to-morrow and shall probably not be here until after the vote is taken, I should like to state simply, without the fullness which would be occupied by an argument, the reason upon which I shall be governed in my vote.

I think one of the greatest dangers to the country now is the danger that the principle will be established that we may use the taxing power of the Government as a means either of punishing or suppressing vice and all crime or any form of wrongdoing. We have, in my judgment, no right under the Constitution to use the taxing power for that purpose. If we have, we can usurp into the hands of Congress the entire power of criminal and penal legislation in this country. We can punish polygamy or murder or burglary or any form of offense against the safety of business like stockjobbing and attempt to reach it in a way by which the measure, on the part of the State, can be defeated, and so get all the powers which belong to the States indirectly into our hands.

It is settled by the Supreme Court that we have the right to use the taxing power when we do not use it for the mere purpose of getting revenue to suppress anything which we have the constitutional right to suppress. We have the right to suppress the currency of State banks under our power to regulate the currency. Therefore the taxing power, being a method of accomplishing a result which is put into the power of Congress, it has been held that we can do it by the use of the taxing power.

So if all the arguments which have been stated with so much eloquence and force against the abuses of the manufacture of this spurious article were all that existed I not only could not give it my support, but I should be bound to resist the measure as one carrying with it an extreme danger. But they are not all. We have undoubtedly under our right to regulate interstate commerce the right to suppress commerce in deleterious articles, and so far there can be no reasonable argument that I can think of against this bill.

We have another right which is well settled, and that is in selecting objects upon which we shall put the tax in raising revenue. We have a right to select objects the burdening of which is not a public injury, and to omit or pass by objects which are a clear benefit, and every burden, or load, or condition placed upon which is a public disadvantage.

We might, I suppose, for the mere purpose of raising a revenue, tax the production of wheat, or of milk, or of honest and wholesome butter as an excise, but we do not do that because we do not want to put any burden upon such products, which are absolutely and unquestionably beneficial. So we take brandy, whisky, tobacco, beer, and articles which, while they yield us a revenue, we do not mean to prohibit their sale if we could. Still nobody claims that if the sale or use of beer, or tobacco, or brandy, or whisky be burdened the public has suffered any disadvantage.

Now, that being true, and it being a sound constitutional principle and a sound principle in the exercise of legislative discretion, we have undertaken to tax oleomargarine under the use of our taxing power on the same principles and for a like reason, and moderately, just as we have undertaken to tax beer and whisky and brandy.

This fraudulent and spurious butter is not only, if what the gentlemen who have spoken are right, as I suppose they are, an injury to the farmers' butter, but it is an escape by fraud or forgery from exhibiting and laying open for purposes of taxation a genuine product of oleomargarine which we have a right to tax. Just as we had the right to tax out of existence the State-bank currency because it interfered with our national currency, which we had a right to provide, to establish, and to regulate, we have a right to tax out of existence spurious oleomargarine because it interferes with the genuine oleomargarine, which is a genuine and legitimate object of taxation. If it incidentally benefits the butter producer, so much the better, just as the taxing out of existence State currency was an incidental benefit to the public by the fact that it extinguished the wild-cat banks which were the curse of this country before 1860. That was a good and additional reason for exercising our discretion, although it was not the constitutional foundation on which the legislation rested.

So it seems to me that this being a wise and beneficent thing in itself, it does not establish the principle of using the power of Congress to tax matters which are merely State products and articles of State commerce alone and do not enter into international or interstate commerce. It is not using that power as a mere national police regulation, but it is a fair and reasonable exercise of our power, justified by established precedents which have received the sanction of the Supreme Court.

I do not wish to debate this matter, but I wished to state the ground on which I shall cast my vote.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; I yield the floor.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts a question. I could not hear him very distinctly. Does he hold that the Congress of the United States has the right to come into my State, where oleomargarine is manufactured with the permission of the State, and tax it out of existence when the oleomargarine manufactured has not entered into interstate commerce? That is a point upon which I should like very much to hear the distinguished Senator.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator had heard me distinctly he would have the answer to his question. I do not like his phrase in that question—if I think the Congress of the United States has a right to come into a State. The Congress of the United States is in every State in this Union just as much as his life blood or his nerves are in his body. It is there just as much as the State government is there, and it is there more than the State government is there, in that wherever it is and as far as it is rightfully there it is the supreme controlling authority.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. But that is a matter of mere phraseology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOAR. I was coming to the substance of the Senator's question, but, certainly, I yield.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Massachusetts concede that there is certain legislation which is given by the Constitution of the United States exclusively to the States; for instance, inspection and police laws?

Mr. HOAR. No; I do not.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator hold then—

Mr. HOAR. I do not concede that there is anything given by the Constitution of the United States to the States. I take a stronger ground in the way of State rights than that. I affirm that there are certain powers which the States possessed as inherent powers of sovereignty before the Constitution was formed, and they never were surrendered to anybody; and there are other inherent powers which the people of the United States possess, which they have not given either to State or to nation. So I have no trouble with the Senator on that point.

But I do not want to be led away from the answer which I rose to make to the Senator's question into a discussion as to whether I am right or wrong with my criticism of his phraseology when he asked me if I thought the Congress of the United States had a right to go into a State. It does not have to go when it acts within its authority; it is there all the time. The Congress of the United States is in Missouri in the exercise of its power a great deal more than it is in Washington.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. There is no difference between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself when he states that the Constitution is in every State in the Union. It is in every State in the Union and in every Territory as to all matters over which jurisdiction is given to the National Government. But the point I make, and upon which I desire to hear the distinguished Senator, is as to inspection laws, as to sanitary laws, within the State. Has not the State exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Very good.

Mr. HOAR. Very good.

Mr. VEST. Then, I ask, can the Congress of the United States come into any State of the Union which permits the manufacture of oleomargarine and interfere with that manufacture when the oleomargarine has not entered into interstate commerce?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I thought I had answered that precise question in what I said before. The Senator said he heard me imperfectly, and undoubtedly he did hear me imperfectly.

The legislative authority of the United States, being always in and over every State, has no right to exercise its penal power or its power of criminal legislation, except in the matters specifically committed to it by the Constitution, anywhere in a State. That is clear. I go further—and this is what I rose to say—and state that it has no right to use its taxing power there when it uses it, not for the purpose of raising revenue, but only to strike some evil thing, or thing supposed to be evil, out of existence, and the attempt to exercise that taxing power for purposes however laudable, but which belong to the States and not to Congress, constitutes, in my mind, one of our present political dangers of a very serious character. If that objection existed to this bill, nothing could induce me to give it my support.

But, on the other hand, we have the right to use the taxing power to strike down, to put out of existence, anything which we have a constitutional right to strike at directly, because it interferes with one of our national functions. We had no right to suppress the State banks in the time of war merely because the wild-cat State bank was an evil, it being confined to State business and authorized by State power; but when we established a national currency we had a right by any method of constitutional action to protect that national currency against the competition or rivalry of any other, to make it exclusive. Therefore we had the right to tax out of existence the currency of State banks, just as we should have had the right to pass a law directly that no State bank should issue currency in competition with ours.

This bill can not be supported constitutionally unless it comes within that principle. Every argument which has been adduced by the very eloquent and brilliant Senator who has just addressed the Senate, or by those who have preceded him in this debate, so far as it stops with saying that oleomargarine as used in purely State commerce, and as purely a State product is a miserable fraud, does not help this bill, in my opinion, in passing. We have a right, however, in selecting objects for national taxation to select such objects as it is no harm to the public to put a burden on, and to avoid such objects as it does hurt the public to put a burden on; and we have the same right to select oleomargarine as an object of revenue in good faith to get money into the Treasury and to pass by butter, just as we select brandy or whisky or beer or tobacco and pass by wheat or corn.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish this sentence. I wish to explain my point, and then I will yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I was merely going—

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish. I can not state these things in a half sentence, and then have to go back and begin over again. I want to get the agony over, and I shall complete what I have to say as soon as I can.

Mr. President, we asserted as a pure taxing power the power to put a tax of 2 cents a pound on oleomargarine, just as we might, if we had been foolish enough, have put a tax on pure butter—which of course no human being would dream of—and we put it there just as we put taxes on beer or tobacco or whisky. Having that tax, the men who make the article which is the subject of our taxation come in, and by fraud or fraudulent device endeavor to present that as something else, so as to escape our taxation for their article. We have a perfect right to say that that article which we tax for the pure purposes of taxation shall not be disguised, or by any fraud made into something else and put on the market, just as we have a right to say that nobody shall import into any port of this country something appearing to be other than it is and thereby get rid of the duty.

If we had the constitutional right to do that, as we have, then the further fact that it puts a burden on a bad thing or stamps a bad thing out of existence, just as the taxing of State currency afforded the further benefit of getting rid of the wildcat banks, does not hurt or diminish our power to do it, but it affords an additional and fair argument for doing it, for the reason that we are attacking a bad thing and not a good thing, just as I said a while ago, we impose a tax on whisky, brandy, and beer, the use of which is not of very great value to mankind altogether, and not on milk or butter or cheese.

Now, I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Massachusetts evidently did not understand the purpose for which I rose. I rose to say that I agreed with him in stating that we had a perfect right to select such articles for taxation as our wisdom might suggest; but the question I desired to propound was, whether the Senator thought the imposition of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine was really intended to raise revenue?

Mr. HOAR. No; and I have tried to make that as clear as I knew how. Conceding that it is not intended to raise revenue, conceding that this tax of 10 cents a pound is to stamp the thing out of existence, this 10 cents a pound is a tax, not on oleomargarine, but on fraud or false coloring. It does not touch the product of the manufacturer of oleomargarine, and his product of oleomargarine is not taxed under this bill when we come to the last analysis. It is the fraud, the coloring to make it look like butter, that we are putting the tax on. We could not do that merely because it is a fraud, as I agree, but it is a fraud that interferes with our legitimate power of taxing, and we impose, I think, 2 cents a pound on uncolored oleomargarine—

Mr. PROCTOR. One-fourth of a cent a pound.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, one-fourth of a cent. The principle is just the same. This is not, in my judgment, the taxing power, but it is the power to crush out or stamp out—

Mr. BAILEY. Then the tax is only on account of the coloring?

Mr. HOAR. But we have got the power to crush out or stamp out this thing, although it is a State manufacture, not alone because it is a bad thing, but because it is a thing which interferes with our legitimate, lawful, and proper taxation of the real thing by disguising the real thing.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, his answer is, that the real purpose of this bill is—and that is the purpose which commands his support of it—that it is intended to destroy the oleomargarine industry.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. BAILEY. At least so far as it attempts to color its product.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think so. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me state it in another way.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I had better contradict that way first.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I stated, if the Senator will pardon, that this tax is in substance on the fraud and not on the manufacture.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say in the beginning that if the only argument in support of this bill was such as was so eloquently advanced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] he would be compelled to vote against it. Further on he suggested the analogy between this tax and the tax upon the issues of State banks, asserting the power of Congress to lay the tax upon the notes of State banks for the purpose of driving them out of competition against the notes of the Government. Then, if that analogy is correct, the purpose of laying this tax upon colored oleomargarine is to drive it out of competition with butter.

Mr. HOAR. Fraudulently colored oleomargarine. I did not say drive it out of competition with butter.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I did not say that the Senator stated that; but I was following his analogy that the Government tax upon State bank notes was justified upon the ground that it drove them out of competition with the Government's own notes.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. And in our power to regulate the currency that right to drive the State bank notes out of existence originated.

The Senator further argued that in our power to regulate commerce originated the power to lay this tax upon oleomargarine.

Mr. HOAR. I said nothing of the kind, nor anything that came within ten thousand million miles of it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a distance that I can not compute, but I do think I can comprehend an analogy even when it is so finely drawn as the Senator from Massachusetts sometimes draws it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator's want of comprehension of what I said is owing to the want of clearness with which I said it, and not to any difficulty of his comprehension.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is too kind.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say what the Senator has stated; but what I said was, that we have the right to tax oleomargarine as an excise just as we have the right to tax butter, but we would not do that.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. HOAR. Then we all agree as to that. The United States in raising a tax on honest, fair oleomargarine is cheated out of that tax by its being disguised, so that it pretends to be something else than what it is; and the fraudulent article is an injury to the genuine article and an injury to our right of taxation, just as the State-bank currency was an injury to our national currency, which we had a right to provide. I did not say that oleomargarine is taxed because it comes in competition with butter, or whatever it was the Senator stated in the last remarks he made, but it is because it is a fraud which destroys practically the right and power of the United States to impose and collect a tax on the genuine article of oleomargarine. It is not because of competition with oleomargarine. It is because it is an injury to the revenue which we get from it.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Government is cheating itself in this operation, because the tax now imposed upon oleomargarine is 2 cents a pound, and from that tax we derive a considerable revenue. The pending bill proposes to reduce that tax upon pure oleomargarine to one-fourth of a cent a pound.

Mr. HOAR. To protect that industry.

Mr. BAILEY. And it is proposed to increase the tax to 10 cents a pound upon colored oleomargarine. So the argument is that the tax upon colored oleomargarine is intended to drive it out of competition against pure oleomargarine. That is the Senator's argument.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what earthly difference does it make whether we reduce that tax of 2 cents a pound or increase it? We tax the genuine article, and we have the power to compel every manufacturer of that genuine article to disclose to mankind what he is doing. Now, he comes in and says: "I will put that under a mark; I will put it under a fraud; I will color it, so that it will pretend to be an article of butter, which is an untaxed article." We say: "No, my friend; you can not do that. We will put a tax on that thing that will drive the fraudulent, disguised, masked imitation of the genuine thing out of existence." There is no reason why we should not do it, if we have the right to do it, for the reason that it also competes with honest butter.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for asking him a question for information before he takes his seat?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to base his support of the bill upon the proposition that this tax on colored oleomargarine is justifiable in order to protect the other tax. In other words, this tax of 10 cents a pound is justifiable in order to protect the Government in the collection of the 2-cent tax or the quarter-cent tax, as the case may be. The question I want to ask the learned Senator is this: If there was no 2-cent or quarter-cent tax, would there be any ground upon which he could base the constitutionality of this act?

Mr. HOAR. I think not. I think if there were no tax whatever on this article it would stand just as the proposition of ex-Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Washburn, to tax stock jobbing or stock gambling where it was entirely confined to the States and did not come at all into interstate commerce, a proposition which I perhaps ought to say found its chief advocates and supporters on the other side of the Chamber, notably in the late very able Senator from Mississippi, Mr. George, the great champion of States' rights. But that does not affect the merits.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, what I was about to say was this: If I understand the logical presentation of the Senator, the object of this bill is not to protect the country against spurious butter, but to protect it against spurious oleomargarine. That is as I understand the proposition of the Senator, and it at least has the virtue of originality.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is my intention to vote for this bill on the very simple ground that, while I have no objection in the world to the sale and purchase of oleomargarine as such, I think the sale of oleomargarine as butter is a fraud which ought to be put an end to. But there is one proposition of the committee as to which I should like to have some information, and that is the proposition to strike out the clause about renovated or process butter. Whatever may be thought of oleomargarine—I believe in itself it is generally considered to be an innocuous product—there is no doubt that process butter, renovated butter, is as bad an article as can possibly be devised; and I do not think this bill ought to pass without a suitable provision in regard to renovated butter.

Mr. QUARLES. There is an amendment which provides for that.

Mr. LODGE. If there is an amendment I have not seen it, and I wanted to ask the Senator from Vermont whether it was the purpose to do nothing in that regard?

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the committee reported in favor of striking out that provision in regard to renovated butter for the reason that it was very imperfect and would not accomplish the purpose aimed at. The Senator from Kansas has this morning offered an amendment fully covering renovated and process butter and adulterated butter. It is fair to the committee to say that some of the members of the committee assisted in the preparation of this amendment, and I am authorized by the committee to say that when that amendment comes up they will agree to it.

Mr. LODGE. That is entirely satisfactory to me, Mr. President. I was not aware of the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Does that amendment prohibit the coloring of butter?

Mr. PROCTOR. It does not.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have heard it remarked here several times this afternoon, or assumed, rather, that this bill is designed to destroy something bad. I thought it was admitted—for certainly the evidence is all that way—that the oleomargarine product is perfectly wholesome and healthful. There is no question about the facts. We are not destroying by this bill anything bad, but we are destroying something good.

The crime of coloring products to resemble butter is not original with the oleomargarine men. I recollect how the crime grew into existence. When I was a boy in western New York some of the northern counties produced yellow butter—Goshen butter it was sometimes called—which sold for a higher price than other butter. Yellow butter became quite a fad. Then they commenced coloring all butter to keep up the fad, and thus they were enabled to sell it for a higher price.

Following that, all classes of butter were colored, even such as ought not to have been allowed to be sold in the market at all. So it is that the people got to be educated to the idea that all butter is yellow, and when an article of butter is introduced it can not be sold unless you conform to this custom. If you could by a penalty prevent the using of any coloring matter in butter, and in oleomargarine and everything sold as butter, there could be no objection to such legislation. That would be honest legislation.

We all know that microbe butter is put upon the market and sold to the injury of the people. An investigation was held at Paris over this thing, and it was shown that numbers of children were killed every year. So it is in New York, and you have reports in your own city here of the death of infants from milk products containing microbes, which result from the mode of keeping the dairies and manipulating the milk. These things are dangerous. You should strike at them.

I undertake to say that if you were to treat them all alike oleomargarine would outsell butter side by side, for it is superior to much of the stuff that is sold as butter.

Mr. TILLMAN. What kind of butter, if the Senator will permit me?

Mr. STEWART. Cow butter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Any kind of cow butter?

Mr. STEWART. No; microbe butter.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is microbe butter?

Mr. STEWART. Butter that kills.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is butter and butter. Of course butter will get rancid very soon if it is not properly handled; but I hope the Senator does not stand here and undertake to say that good, honest cow butter is not better than any imitation of it that is ever manufactured.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know about that. I will tell you what you will find. If you will read the reports of the investigations that are now taking place in Paris and in New York, and read the reports here, showing the death-dealing poisons that are the result of milk products, cow products, and dairy products, you will see that you have to choose for your families, not knowing whether it is microbe butter or pure cow butter, because you can not determine that from the color. You might be able to judge pretty well if it was in the natural color, but when it is doctored and fixed up in that way, if you had to choose for your family between this colored microbe butter and oleomargarine you would take the safe side, as many do now, and buy oleomargarine. That is one of the reasons why oleomargarine has such a large sale. The reports which are constantly being made of the impurities in cow products have alarmed a great portion of the people, and they buy oleomargarine for self-protection.

All that honest legislation should require is that these products should be clean, healthful, and bear their own natural color without deception; but persons should not be allowed to color butter containing this death-dealing poison and fix it in an attractive way for the purpose of selling when you will not allow persons selling wholesome products to color them. That is what I complain of in this bill. I do not think it is fair legislation. I think there is a necessity for legislation requiring that there should be no coloring in any of these products.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If microbe butter were uncolored, it would still be microbe butter, would it not?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; it would be microbe butter.

Mr. SPOONER. You could not tell it from the fact that it was not colored?

Mr. STEWART. But the butter that is unclean is badly made. Some of you have been in a country store and have seen butter brought in and packed down in the cellar, where it is worked over and doctored up after it has been gathered in, and then sold off by the butter dealers as first-class butter. I am not at all afraid of that stuff getting much headway on its own merits. You can see what it is, and that is sufficient. Take the coloring off of it and there is nothing disgusting in the appearance of oleomargarine, and that is where it would have a great advantage. If you take them both in the natural state, oleomargarine is the best article altogether. The ordinary, poor, miserable butter, which ought not to be sold, shows for itself if you do not color it. Take the coloring off and give the people a show, or leave the coloring on both, and let the oleomargarine have a show.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 27, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 26, 1902.

APPOINTMENTS BY BREVET IN THE ARMY.

To be captain, by brevet.

First Lieut. Henry C. Clement, jr., Twenty-first Infantry, for distinguished gallantry in action near Calamba, Luzon, Philippine Islands, July 30, 1899, to rank from that date.

(NOTE.—This officer was nominated to the Senate March 20, 1902, for appointment to the above-named office, under the name of Harry C. Clement, jr. This message is submitted to correct error in the name of the nominee.)

SURVEYORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mahlon M. Garland, of Pennsylvania, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Pittsburg, in the State of Pennsylvania. (Reappointment.)

Perry M. Lytle, of Pennsylvania, to be surveyor of customs in the district of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania. (Reappointment.)

INDIAN AGENTS.

Frederic O. Getchell, of North Dakota, to be agent for the Indians of the Devils Lake Agency, in North Dakota, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

A. W. Thomas, of Seymour, N. Dak., to be agent for the Indians of the Fort Berthold Agency, in North Dakota, vice Thomas Richards, term expired; George L. Robinson, who was confirmed January 31, 1902, having declined appointment.

Albert M. Anderson, of Washington, to be agent for the Indians of the Colville Agency in Washington, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

Herman G. Nickerson, of Wyoming, to be agent for the Indians of the Shoshone Agency in Wyoming, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Civil Engineer Mordecai T. Endicott, United States Navy, to be Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of rear-admiral, from the 4th day of April, 1902.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 26, 1902.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Harold P. Norton, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 26th day of October, 1901.

Lieut. Frank M. Bennett, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 28th day of December, 1901.

Commander John D. Ford, to be a captain in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902.

Commander Charles R. Roelker, to be a captain in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902.

Lieut. Commander Asher C. Baker, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902.

Lieut. Commander William H. H. Southerland, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902.

Lieut. Thomas Snowden, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 5th day of March, 1902.

Lieut. Commander Charles E. Fox, to be a commander in the Navy, from the 16th day of March, 1902.

POSTMASTERS.

Charles W. Nugen, to be postmaster at Kimball, in the county of Brule and State of South Dakota.

Milton P. Schautz, to be postmaster at Allentown, in the county of Lehigh and State of Pennsylvania.

Ross L. Hammond, to be postmaster at Fremont, in the county of Dodge and State of Nebraska.

Francis M. Love, to be postmaster at Lewistown, in the county of Fulton and State of Illinois.

Josiah Ketcham, to be postmaster at Belvidere, in the county of Warren and State of New Jersey.

De Witt C. Cole, to be postmaster at Marietta, in the county of Cobb and State of Georgia.

John F. Keller, to be postmaster at Romney, in the county of Hampshire and State of West Virginia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEN. NELSON A. MILES.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, by direction of that committee, submits the following privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if same is not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House copies of all correspondence relating to, and papers bearing on, the matter of the recent request of Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, United States Army, to be assigned to duty in the Philippine Archipelago and to be allowed to put into effect there a plan outlined by him having for its purpose and being calculated to bring about an immediate cessation of hostilities in said Philippine Archipelago without further loss of life on either side.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In line 5 strike out the word "recent" and insert the word "reported."

In lines 8 and 9, after the word "him," strike out the words "having for its purpose and being calculated," and in line 9, after the word "about," strike out "an immediate" and insert "a."

In line 10, after the word "hostilities," strike out "in said Philippine Archipelago without further loss of life on either side."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12804, the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12804, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. HEMENWAY in the chair.

Mr. HULL. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK].

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the bill under consideration, the Army appropriation bill, has been very ably prepared, and I think the thanks of the House are due to the Committee on Military Affairs for the splendid work which has been done in framing a bill that meets all the requirements and at the same time is more than $11,000,000 less than the estimates.

There is one thing, however, in this admirable bill that I take very great exception to. I think as a matter of fact and of law that it is subject to a point of order, and if it were in order at this time I should submit the point of order. This provision that I object to is found on page 11 of the bill and reads as follows:

Provided, That hereafter there shall not be allowed or paid any increase of longevity pay to any officer retired from actual service above the sum allowed and paid to such officer at the date of retirement.

The practical effect of this provision is to reduce the pay of every officer who was retired because of wounds received or disabilities incurred in the line of duty in our great civil war. It does not affect any officer who was on post duty or who was on staff duty at some city headquarters, far removed from the scene of danger, and who passed through the war without injury. It does not affect those gallant officers who had the good fortune to pass through the dangers and hardships of that war without disability, but it does affect 70 officers who were retired because of wounds received on the field of battle. Some of these officers lost legs or arms, and one officer lost both legs and was retired with the rank of lieutenant. Most of these officers were retired shortly after the close of our civil war with very low rank. Very few of them were retired with rank above that of lieutenant or captain.

They were retired on three-quarters pay, and for more than thirty years they have been receiving, by virtue of the laws of Congress, an increase of 10 per cent for every five years continued in the service, not exceeding a period of twenty years; so that the extreme maximum of increase would be 40 per cent. These officers, as I have said, were retired very soon after the close of the civil war. I know many of them personally. They are now growing old, averaging in age from about 60 to 75 years. When they were young men they gave up their business and their professions and entered the Army. They were prompted by the loftiest patriotism and by the purest motives. Some of them gave up most brilliant prospects for successful careers, but they were so unfortunate as to be wounded upon the field of battle while in the line of duty. If they had been as fortunate as their comrades who escaped unharmed and who passed through the dangers and hardships of the civil war without injury, they would to-day be enjoying higher rank and increased pay, as those comrades are.

But because they were stricken down, because they were no longer able to discharge the active duties of their office, because they were physical wrecks, because they were wounded, maimed, and disabled for life, these men were retired by a peremptory order from the Government upon three-fourths pay and this provision as to the increase. When these men were so retired there was no further opportunity for promotion for them. When they were so retired their careers as far as the Army was concerned were ended. The avenues of civil life were practically closed to them because on account of their disabilities they were not able to compete with the earnest, active strugglers who crowd every avenue of labor and of thought.

Mr. JETT. Do you know of any other business where any men are cared for by three-fourths pay outside of the Army and Navy?

Mr. WARNOCK. I do, sir. The Pennsylvania Railroad retires its employees on a time limit on three-fourths pay. [Applause.]

Mr. JETT. Any other employees of the Government?

Mr. WARNOCK. I do not know of any other service or any other occupation that stands on the same plane that does the man who risks his life in defense of his flag. [Applause.] I said the avenues of civil life were practically closed on account of the active, earnest strugglers who crowded every avenue of labor and thought. These men thus retired could live only in the past. They could rejoice only in that which they once had been. So far as their lives were concerned, there was nothing for them to do but to endure and to wait. Now a proposition comes to take from these brave old veterans this pay which has been granted to them by an act of Congress and which has been received for the last thirty years. I have been unable to understand why this remarkable proposition should have been made.

If this Government were insolvent, if this Government were bankrupt, if it were in the throes of financial distress, if we were in the midst of a great panic, if we were not prosperous in our industries, if there were a failure in our crops, if gaunt famine were stalking throughout this land, then I might be able to understand this proposition of economy with reference to these old veterans; but with the Treasury overflowing, with our industries all working full time and overtime, with a commerce such as the world has never known, and a prosperity such as the world has never known, I am unable to comprehend why this proposition is now made to take from these old veterans the little miserable increase of pay that has been given to them by the Congress before the generosity of the people had grown cold for the services rendered by these old veterans.

Who are the men whom it is now proposed to single out by reason of this provision in this law? Each and every one of them was a hero in the mightiest struggle that ever shook a continent. These men who participated in these engagements were heroes as great as ever walked and fought and endured upon the battlefields of earth. Other wars have continued longer, but there were cessations for recuperation and rest; but with our great civil war there was no cessation for four long years, and during that struggle there was no time when one army could say, "My enemy is asleep and is taking a vacation, and I will take a rest." It was one long, continuous, strenuous struggle for four long years of bloody war. In that struggle there were 1,882 general engagements, battles, and skirmishes in which at least one regiment was engaged on each side, being an average of more than one for every day of the four years. There were 112 general engagements in which the losses on one side or the other exceeded 500 in killed and wounded.

It was a struggle in which, including both sides, half a million men were killed or mortally wounded upon the battlefield and a million men permanently disabled. It was a struggle in which American manhood, courage, endurance, and skill were pitted against American manhood, courage, endurance, and skill. It was the greatest war of the century. It was the greatest because it was the bloodiest and fraught with the greatest results to mankind. The bloodiest wars have not always been the most decisive, but they have always been the most historic. The most memorable wars of the world are those which have been made so because of the fatalities which have attended them. When the world comes to assign its place in history to a great battle, it usually assigns it by the length of the casualty list. Measured by this standard, the great battles of our civil war have been away and beyond the bloodiest struggles of all history. [Applause.] I was greatly impressed by this not long ago when reading Fox's Regimental Losses. In that book comparisons were instituted between the losses in the great battles of our civil war and the losses in the battles of other times and other countries, and I am indebted to that book for the figures that I shall give. It is very interesting to compare some of those figures.

First, there was the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, which Tennyson has made famous in immortal verse, so that we have come to regard that as one of the most gallant, heroic exhibitions of human effort in all history. In that charge 673 men obeyed an ill-advised order, and rode to their death. No victory was won, no results were accomplished, but it takes its place in history and in song because of the fatalities which attended it. Of the 673 men who made that charge 113 were killed, 134 wounded, making a total loss of 247, or a per cent of loss of 36.7. But we had 150 regiments in our great civil war—75 on the Union side and 75 on the Confederate side—that had a greater loss than that. In a single engagement each of these regiments lost over 40 per cent of the numbers engaged.

Take, again, the Franco-Prussian war, the greatest loss sustained in any engagement by any regiment during that war was that of the Third Westphalian at Mars la Tour. It went into the engagement with 3,000 men, and it lost in killed, wounded, and missing 1,484, a loss of 49.4 per cent. But we had 120 regiments in the Union and Confederate armies that had a greater loss than 50 per cent of the numbers engaged—some as high as 60, 70, 75 per cent—and two regiments, one in the Confederate army and one in the Union Army, that had a percentage of loss of over 82 per cent of the numbers engaged.

The following tables give the list of regiments, battles, numbers engaged, losses in killed, wounded, and missing, and the per cent of loss:

Maximum percentage of casualties.

Regiment.	Battle.	Engaged.	Killed.*	Wounded.	Missing.	Per cent.

<sup>b</sup> In addition to the 588 killed and wounded, this regiment lost 120 missing, many of whom were killed.

<sup>c</sup> General Ewell, in his official report, states that the Second North Carolina Battalion lost 200 killed and wounded out of 200 present.

<sup>e</sup> There were 51 missing also, who are not included, most of whom were killed or wounded.

The foregoing are the immortal records of more than 60 regiments in each army, where the loss in killed and wounded was from 50 to 85 per cent of the numbers engaged. Let us make a little further comparison. Take the great battle of Waterloo, one of the 15 decisive battles of the world, a battle which decided the fate and changed the geography of all Europe. In that battle Napoleon had 82,000 men and 256 guns. Wellington, with the allies, had 72,000 men and over 200 guns. They lost on each side in killed and wounded about 23,000 men, being a percentage of loss of from 25 to 32 per cent. Turn to the great battle of Gettysburg and compare it with the battle of Waterloo, and there is a wonderful similarity between the two in some respects. General Meade had in his army almost precisely the same number of men Napoleon had at Waterloo.

Mr. BURLESON. May I ask the gentleman a question at this point?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman state how the mortality of the battles in the civil war compare with the mortality at the battle at San Juan Hill? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNOCK. It is no embarrassment to me personally, and I think that question would answer itself. None of the battles that I have named as battles—

Mr. BURLESON. I withdraw the question if it embarrasses the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNOCK. I have said that at Gettysburg General Meade had 82,000 men, with the Sixth Corps in reserve, with 250 guns. General Lee had an army of 72,000 men, with 200 guns. The losses were 23,000 on each side in that engagement, almost identical with the losses at Waterloo.

Now, let us compare Gettysburg and Waterloo with some of the other great battles of history. The battle between the French and Russians at Borodino was perhaps the bloodiest battle since the invention of gunpowder; there were 30,000 men killed on each side. But as each army numbered over 130,000, the per cent of loss was less than at Gettysburg and less than at Waterloo.

Mr. OTEY. Can not the gentleman account for the difference in the loss by the fact that at the battle of Gettysburg and other battles he has named the soldiers on both sides were Americans?

Mr. WARNOCK. Why, sir, that is the point of my argument, and I am glad the gentleman has seen it in advance. It is because they were Americans. Take the great battle at Leipzig, where Napoleon had 175,000 men and where the allies had on the first day 275,000, increased on the next day by reinforcements to 330,000. There were about 40,000 killed on each side. Yet the very large numbers engaged in that battle made the per cent of loss very much less than at Gettysburg or Waterloo. It would be interesting to compare other battles, but I will not weary the House.

Mr. OTEY. I would like to make one statement by way of correction of the gentleman's remarks. If he will go to the War Department he will find by the records that at the battle of Gettysburg the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment (I am from Virginia) lost 90 per cent.

Mr. WARNOCK. I have that in the record; but I did not read down to it. I will comment on that a little further on.

Mr. BURLESON. Just one more question, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. WARNOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. How does the ratio of brevets which were conferred as the result of the battle of Gettysburg compare with the brevets which were conferred as a result of the sanguinary conflict which took place at San Juan Hill?

Mr. WARNOCK. I thought the gentleman had withdrawn that question.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, if it is embarrassing to the gentleman, I will withdraw it. I withdraw it.

Mr. WARNOCK. As I said, it is not embarrassing to me personally. I was about to say that the greatest loss of a single regiment on the Union side in any one engagement was that of the First Minnesota at the battle of Gettysburg. During the second day's fight, when the Union Army was driven back from Emmetsburg road in disaster and defeat, General Hancock was making a wonderful effort to establish a new line. He had but one regiment at hand, and that was the First Minnesota, numbering 263 men. While he was having the reinforcements hurried up, he saw suddenly marching from a clump of trees Wilcox's Confederate brigade. He saw from the position and rapid movements of that brigade that they would occupy, unless he could prevent it, the position that he regarded as the key to that part of his lines. Seeing the extremity to which he was reduced, he rode to Colonel Colville, commanding the First Minnesota, and, pointing to the advancing colors, gave the order, "Take those colors." Without a moment's hesitation the gallant Minnesotans charged upon those colors. A desperate hand-to-hand conflict ensued. The advance of the Confederate brigade was checked, but 215 of the First Minnesota Regiment were left upon that battlefield dead or wounded and bleeding. The 47, however, who went back carried the colors with them. That check saved that line from disaster on that day. [Applause.]

General Hancock, speaking of it afterwards, said it was the most gallant deed recorded in history. "I needed," he said, "a few minutes in order to repair my lines. I saw that if I could not check the brigade that was advancing my line would be broken and the position would be lost." It was the position at Little Round Top; and he said "I would have ordered that regiment in to make that charge if I had known absolutely that every man would have been killed. I was glad that I had a regiment so near at hand willing to make this great sacrifice." The loss to that regiment on that day was 82  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman yield to me now for another question?

Mr. WARNOCK. Certainly.

Mr. OTEY. Is it not recorded in the War Department that the Spanish army at Santiago positively refused to surrender until they were requested to do so? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNOCK. Well, if the gentleman will ask me anything about the war I was in I will be glad to tell him, so far as I know. I was not at San Juan, and I was not in the Spanish war. I wrote to the President (I have his letter on file) and he thought I was a little too old to go down to Cuba and Porto Rico; so that I am not posted as to that war. Take, again, the One hundred and forty-first Pennsylvania Regiment at Gettysburg. That regiment went in with 198 men and they lost in killed and wounded 149, a loss of 75.7 per cent. I shall not attempt to discriminate further, except to say that the most pathetic incident, to my mind, in that entire struggle was when the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts at Cold Harbor was ordered to make the charge at that place, which history condemns, which General Grant himself condemns, which the men themselves, with a keen instinct, knew was a blunder.

Notwithstanding this these same men deliberately began writing their names on slips of paper and pinned them on the inside of their blouses, that their dead bodies might be identified, and with that staring them in the face, they made the charge and came out, a little remnant of them, 90 men out of 310 who made that charge. Where there were such losses inflicted, it is only fair to say that equal losses were inflicted in turn, and so I call attention to the First Texas at Antietam, with its 226 men, having 45 killed and 141 wounded, being a loss of 82.3 per cent. I come again to the question asked me by the gentleman from Virginia in regard to the Twenty-sixth North Carolina. That I regard as one of the most remarkable instances in all history. That regiment was 820 strong. It had 86 killed and 502 wounded, making a total of 588, or 71.7 per cent. That was on the first day's battle; but the most remarkable part of it is that this regiment on the third day's fight turned up with a little remnant of 216 men out of their 820, and participated in that gallant charge, and came out with only 80 men left. [Applause.]

That I regard as the most remarkable loss in all history. There was a company in that regiment—Captain Tuttle's company—that went in with 3 officers and 84 men. They came out of that with only 1 officer and 1 man. Another remarkable fact about that contest was the greater loss of officers in proportion to the enlisted men. There were 110,090 men killed in action in the Union Army. Of these 6,365 were officers and 103,725 enlisted men, being 1 officer to 16 men. The regiments as organized had 1 officer to 28 men; but when they were depleted the average became 1 officer to 21 men. It is not claimed that this increase of loss on part of the officers is due to any greater bravery on their part, but because they were charged with greater responsibility and were made the targets for the sharpshooters and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given time to finish his remarks.

Mr. HULL. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. OTEY. Let him finish.

Several MEMBERS. Let him finish.

Mr. WARNOCK. I will not take over ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNOCK. As my time is limited, I pass on to a little incident which I think is a tribute well worth preserving. General Scott was asked on one occasion before he had resigned his active command of the Army, "Why is it that it takes you so long to get into Richmond, Va., when you got into the City of Mexico in such a short time?" His answer was, "Because some of the men that are keeping me out of Richmond are some of the men that helped me get into Mexico." [Applause.]

And now it is proposed to take away from the old battle-scarred heroes that helped to fight these battles, that helped to make these immortal records—it is proposed to take away from them the little increased pay which they were allowed by a generous Government thirty years ago, when their services had not been forgotten. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman permit me just a question there? I will yield him the time to make it up.

Mr. WARNOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that those battles were largely fought by the volunteer?

Mr. WARNOCK. Why, certainly.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman understand this as affecting the volunteer?

Mr. WARNOCK. I do not.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that the volunteer that lost a leg would get from $35 to $40 a month?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that the regular who lost a leg would get three-quarters of his pay at that time?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman think, as justice between the regular and the volunteer, that the one should have, say, $3,000 a year and increase that every year for twenty years on the retired list, and the other never get but the one?

Mr. WARNOCK. The cases are not parallel. When the volunteer went into service it was simply an episode in his life. He went for three years.

Mr. HULL. But he lost his leg?

Mr. WARNOCK. He did; but when the Regular Army officer went into that war or into any other war it was his profession; it was his business for life; he was fitted for that, and for nothing else.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNOCK. Why, I can not get through with what I have.

Mr. HULL. I will yield the time.

Mr. WARNOCK. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know how many officers who participated in the war of the rebellion would be affected by the provision to which he refers?

Mr. WARNOCK. I know this—

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know how many?

Mr. WARNOCK. I can not give you the exact number.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, we can.

Mr. WARNOCK. I know that there are 700 retired Army officers.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And only about 70 of them are affected by this bill, so that I do not believe the gentleman can name three who are affected by this provision, and all this talk about the gallant conduct of officers in the war of the rebellion refers to the volunteers. It does not refer to those veterans of the Regular Army who have been on the retired list for so long and who are drawing an increased amount every five years.

Mr. WARNOCK. I know positively that that statement is not true. I know that the regular infantry regiments of the Army of the United States participated in every great battle of that war. And I know, personally, several officers of the Regular Army who were wounded in one or other of those great battles and retired with low rank, and one who lost both legs and was retired as lieutenant.

Mr. HULL. Well, he gets three-quarters of that pay.

Mr. WARNOCK. Certainly, he does.

Mr. HULL. Now, just right there. Suppose he had been a captain of infantry in the volunteer service, what would he have got?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. What portion of what he now gets would he get?

Mr. WARNOCK. He would have gotten the various rates that are established.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. He would get about one-third of what he gets now.

Mr. WARNOCK. That is very true; but if he had not given up his life and given up his business and given up his profession to go into the Regular Army he would have had a business and a profession to which he could have returned at the close of the war when he was disabled; but he had no such business; he had no such profession; he was not fitted for anything else; he was a soldier, trained as such—a professional soldier—and unfitted for any other pursuit.

What is the reason urged now for this proposition? The reason that has been suggested is that the law discriminates between the volunteer and the regular. I say it does not. The regulars stand on a different footing. One reason urged is that these men have no vested rights in the increased pay. This law was enacted subsequent to the time that these gentlemen entered the service, and as the law can be repealed they have no vested rights. I grant that that is true, but I never expected to live to see the day when the American Congress would calmly and deliberately weigh the claims of the old veterans by a mere cold, legal statement of vested rights. Why, to my mind the old crippled officer with one leg or one arm or bearing on his body honorable scars of painful wounds received in the defense of his country has a more sacred claim, because of his disabilities, than could ever come by any mere cold, legal vested rights. I do not believe that the time has come when the American Congress or the American people are ready and willing to economize at the expense of courage and patriotism and valor in order that they may squander their millions for mere tinsel or show or some useless public improvement. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMER. Does this provision take away anything that the officer has been getting?

Mr. WARNOCK. It takes away the increased pay that was allowed in 1870 for every five years of service, so that if an officer were retired before 1870 it would take away the 40 per cent that he has been receiving for the years after twenty years had elapsed. In other words, the law only gave this increase at the rate of 10 per cent for each five years, and when his service was twenty years, then the increase stopped. So that it makes 40 per cent of his salary, and these men have adjusted themselves to that manner of living and their families have, and I regard that as an additional reason why these men in their old age, with one foot in the grave, should not now be treated in that way by a generous Government.

Mr. PALMER. Will they get as much in the future as they have been getting in the past? That is what I want to know.

Mr. WARNOCK. Not if this provision prevails. The 40 per cent of their pay will be taken away.

Mr. PALMER. Then I am with you.

Mr. NORTON. And we are all with you, as far as that is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. I ask the gentleman from New York now to proceed in his time.

Mr. SULZER. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on the 8th day of March I introduced a resolution directing an inquiry to the Department of State with reference to its alleged refusal to issue certain passports to the Rev. Dr. Thomas and his wife to visit the concentration camps in South Africa, to relieve the distress of the noncombatant women and children there confined.

On the 14th of that month this resolution, having been in the meantime broadened in its scope by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was reported and unanimously adopted by the House. I contend that neither the inquiry with reference to this matter originally propounded to the State Department, nor the inquiry provided for by the resolution adopted has been answered in spirit or in letter.

Many times during the past two years the chief officer of the State Department has been denounced as an Anglomaniac and as a pro-British sympathizer. In the press and upon this floor it has been charged that through his instrumentality this Government was being used as a buttress for Great Britain in the prosecution of the unholy war she is conducting in South Africa.

I have never indulged in this harsh criticism against the officers of our State Department. It is not my purpose now to indulge in any harsh language against the head of the State Department; but it is my purpose by the utilization of irrefutable logic applied to indisputable facts and circumstances, which I shall lay before you, to demonstrate that in this matter he deserves at the hands of every true American condemnation for his derelict conduct. I wish to be perfectly fair in this discussion and do not desire to reach any conclusion not justified by the unquestioned facts.

In the first place, what inquiry was originally made of the Secretary of State; what action did Governor Yates and his committee, the parties at interest, attempt to secure at his hands? I will submit it to the candid judgment and determination of every honest man in this House that the query propounded and the action solicited at the hands of the State Department was clearly made manifest as early as January 7 in a letter to the State Department by Mr. Van Vlissingen.

That what was wanted was clearly understood by the State Department is disclosed by Mr. David J. Hill, of the Department, in his reply, dated January 9, 1902, to this letter of Mr. Van Vlissingen, member of "Governor Yates's Boer Relief Fund" committee. Now, what action was asked at the hands of the State Department? What did the representatives of Governor Yates and his relief committee seek to obtain from the Secretary of State?

They wished to enlist the good offices of the Secretary of State of the United States to secure a permit from the British war office for Dr. Thomas and his wife to proceed to South Africa upon their charitable mission to relieve the dying women and children there confined in concentration camps. Am I doing the Secretary of State an injustice? Let us see.

I read from a letter of Mr. David J. Hill upon that point. It is known to everyone that an ordinary passport can be secured by making an affidavit before any notary public to American citizenship and applying to the passport clerk in the State Department. The intervention of the Secretary of State or other high officials of the State Department is not necessary to secure passports. In the letter referred to, Mr. David J. Hill, the First Assistant Secretary of State, uses this language, speaking with reference to what was necessary if Dr. Thomas undertook the mission contemplated:

The Department is informed that a permit should be procured from the British Government by every person desiring to proceed to South Africa, and that no person unprovided with such permit is allowed by the authorities in South Africa to land, except under special circumstances. Permits are issued by the colonial secretary in London on production of satisfactory evidence from the United States embassy that the purpose of the contemplated journey is legitimate, etc.

Consequently, gentlemen, I am justified in my statement that the State Department was exactly advised of what was wanted before Mr. Knight, acting for the Boer relief committee, appointed by Governor Yates, first visited the State Department. Furthermore, in a letter which is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. Knight uses this language in reference to that visit:

In order to secure the admittance of Dr. Thomas to the concentration camps, however, it was realized that it would be necessary to first secure passports [permits] from the British war office—to enable him to proceed to his destination.

The British war office—

He knew that this permit was absolutely essential, and his sole mission to the State Department was to enlist the good offices of the Secretary of State in order to secure it. Now, is it possible that I am mistaken about this?

Let us go one step further and see. In addition to this letter, which had been addressed by Mr. Van Vlissingen to the Secretary of State in the early part of January, and the reply of Mr. Hill, which disclosed what was necessary to have in the way of permits and what was wanted, Mr. Knight, before he visited the Secretary of State, secured an interview with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and clearly explained to him his mission.

Now, if only an ordinary passport was desired, if the application was to be made for a simple passport, what would have been the necessity of securing the intervention and assistance of the great chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate?

Every man here knows that the chairman of that great committee ought to be versed in international law.

Every man here knows that if Mr. Knight had gone to him to ask his assistance to secure a simple passport that he would have replied, "There is no necessity for it. Go to the passport clerk and get it." Mr. Knight informs you that in the archives of the Secretary of State's office there is a letter from Senator CULLOM, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, laying this matter before Mr. Hay, setting forth in detail what was desired by the Boer Relief Fund Committee. Let me read further from Mr. Knight's letter, and it has been published for days, and has never been questioned and can not be contradicted.

I first went to Senator CULLOM, of Illinois, and explained to him the nature of my mission. He then gave me a note to Secretary Hay, again explaining what I sought, as it had been stated to him, and speaking a high word of praise for the character of Dr. Thomas, with whom he is personally acquainted.

In addition to the letter written by First Assistant Secretary Hill in the archives of the State Department there is this letter from Senator CULLOM disclosing the fact that it was not a passport, but the good offices of the Secretary of the Department, which was sought in order to secure a permit from the British war office for Dr. Thomas and his wife to visit the concentration camps where the unfortunates were confined. There has been no denial of it, because the State Department can not truthfully deny it.

Now, let us go one step further. These facts which I have cited can not be questioned. I now desire to cite an indisputable circumstance in support of my contention. Mr. Knight was thoroughly familiar with conditions in South Africa, having spent several months there. He knew an ordinary passport would be valueless; he knew that it would be necessary to secure this permit from the British war office, and concluded it was best to secure it through the good offices of the State Department, if it could be done. I will read from a recent letter of his on that point:

Having spent several months in South Africa during the present war as a newspaper correspondent, I was also familiar with the situation there and knew just what would be needed from the British authorities in the way of passports or passes, and having carried an American passport during that time, which I secured through a notary public in California, I well knew the incompetency of such a passport to secure entrance to a country under martial law unless it bore the indorsement of those in control of the military situation.

This additional circumstance conclusively establishes the fact that the Secretary of State knew that it was not passports, but his good offices, which were sought to secure this permit from the British war office.

Again:

At first the plan was entertained of having Dr. Thomas go direct to London and make his application there, but this was afterwards rejected on the ground that such a trip would incur heavy expense and might be without satisfactory result. It was then decided to bring the matter directly before our own State Department, have the matter brought, if possible, by our Secretary of State to the attention of the British ambassador here, and laid by him before the London war office.

This I read from the same letter from the representative of the "Boer Relief Fund Committee" appointed by Governor Yates.

You will see, gentlemen, that I am not mistaken in my contention that prior to March 11 the State Department knew that it was the good offices of the State Department in securing these permits, which were desired, and not mere passports.

But if gentlemen who are anxious to defend the State Department, who feel that it is incumbent upon them to defend the Secretary of State, see fit to say that the matter was still in doubt at that time as to what was asked of the Secretary of State, I will again read for their benefit a communication addressed to the State Department which removes it entirely from the field of uncertainty.

After the interview with the Secretary of State wherein he was requested to use his good offices to bring Dr. Thomas's application for permission to visit the South African concentration camps in the interest of charity before the British ambassador, for the purpose of having it passed on by the British war office, and after, it is claimed, the Secretary of State had declined to do this on the ground that such action on his part might be considered meddling, a remissness, etc., Mr. Knight addressed a communication to the Secretary of State dated March 11, which is in the RECORD, on page 2816, bringing directly to the attention of the State Department that it was not passports, but his good offices which were sought.

On the 14th of March, with conditions as I have now detailed them, the resolution I had introduced was brought up before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Precipitately, without having official knowledge of the existence of the resolution, the Secretary of State (according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]) wrote a letter to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in answer to an inquiry which was set forth in the resolution as originally introduced. The scope of this resolution was subsequently broadened by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to recite and meet the true conditions, and of course to the resolution thus broadened the letter of the Secretary of State was no answer.

In my opinion, in the light of what had transpired—but I forego the expression of an opinion and submit the question to you—was not the letter thrust before this committee and subsequently read to you an attempt to evade the real issue? After this letter from the Secretary of State was read by the gentleman from Illinois, the resolution, broadened in its scope, as I have shown, was unanimously reported and unanimously adopted. Conditions remained in statu quo until March 17, at which time this letter was addressed to the honorable Secretary of State by Mr. Knight:

The honorable SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I had the honor to present a written communication to your Department on the 11th instant, requesting your good offices to secure, through the British ambassador in Washington or such other agency as you might deem best, a permit from the British authorities to enable Dr. and Mrs. Hiram W. Thomas to visit the Boer concentration camps in South Africa for the purpose of disbursing funds collected in the State of Illinois for the relief of women, children, and other noncombatants held in these military camps. No reply to my communication has been received.

In view of the fact that women and children are dying by the scores and hundreds for the want of proper care, as is shown by the British official reports of the condition in these camps, and as the very purposes for which the charitable people of Illinois have subscribed funds are, in a measure, being thwarted by the continued delay in dispatching the relief which they wish to send, I now beg leave to request that a reply be made to my communication as early as the matter can be consistently reached by your Department.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,

JOHN O. KNIGHT,

Acting for Boer Relief Committee appointed by Governor Yates.

HOTEL RALEIGH,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1902.

To this letter the Secretary of State to this day has made no reply, unless this news item to which I direct your attention may be considered an answer. In the next morning's issue of the Washington Post, under the caption "War Office dodges inquiry," which did not refer to this dodge, but another made by Mr. Broderick, the war secretary of Great Britain, to an inquiry made by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Liberal leader in the House of Commons, was this statement:

WAR OFFICE DODGES INQUIRY—BRODERICK SAYS INVESTIGATION WOULD BE DISASTROUS JUST NOW.

Secretary Hay will not make further response to the House resolution inquiring into the facts connected with the application of Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Thomas for passports to reach the Boer camps. All the facts in the case were set out in the Secretary's letter, written in anticipation of the passage of the resolution of inquiry and read by Mr. HITT to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Secretary is communicating with Governor Yates, of Illinois, who initiated the movement to send the Thomases to South Africa, to ascertain exactly what is wanted by the contributors to the fund.

This news item states: "All the facts in the case were set out in the Secretary's letter written in anticipation of the passage of the resolution of inquiry."

Now, gentlemen, upon your conscience, aside from partisanship—and there is no partisanship involved here—I submit to every candid, fair-minded man whether the letter meets any of the true facts of this case.

Is there any allusion in Secretary Hay's letter to the fact that Mr. CULLOM, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in a letter, had explained to him exactly what was wanted? Is there any allusion to the fact that Mr. Knight had addressed him on the 11th of March a clean-cut, explicit request for his good offices to secure this permit? On the contrary, these unquestioned facts were ignored. On the contrary—I dislike to indulge in strong language, but this letter was an evasion on the part of the Secretary of State. Why? Because he could not meet the true facts without demonstrating that he had proven derelict, that he had shown himself un-American when this eminently proper request was submitted to him.

It is such conduct as this on the part of high officials of our Government which warranted the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Britain's colonial secretary, in making this remarkable statement:

"We must make the Boers recognize that they are defeated, and take from them the barest possibility of repeating the attempt. * * * The war has the approval of sister nations across the sea."

These were his words, spoken in an address recently delivered by him at Guildhall, London. Thus, for the first time in our history, we are placed in the attitude of having sympathy for a monarchy as against a republic.

What was the purpose of this request which was refused by our Secretary of State? It was to furnish relief in the way of medicine, food, and clothing to Boer women and children confined in concentration camps in South Africa, their husbands and fathers being in the field struggling for independence as did our revolutionary sires in 1776, and that, too, against the same tyrannical foe. How can any true American uphold the Secretary of State in his refusal to aid in this humane undertaking?

What are the conditions prevailing in South Africa? Some two years ago a few thousand honest Dutch burghers were living there under a government of their own—a Christian, God-fearing, peace-loving people—the majority of them engaged in pastoral pursuits. In an evil moment for them gold was discovered in their country in immense quantities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time, which is to be equally divided, is controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] on one side and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] on the other.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then I appeal to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. How much further time does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] desire?

Mr. BURLESON. Ten minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. BURLESON. As I was saying, in an evil moment, gold was discovered in that country. This discovery excited the greed and the money lust of Britain's subjects. Immediately plans were set on foot by that wonderfully strong man, Cecil Rhodes, acting for the British Empire, to overturn the government of the Boers—to wrest from the control of those peace-loving, inoffensive people their country. For two years a contest has been waged there, without a parallel in history.

A people unaccustomed to the arts of war—only 25,000 of them—without financial resources, without credit, without an open port, when the effort was made to destroy their government, animated by the spirit which moved our illustrious Washington, took up arms in defense of their country.

Opposed to them is the most powerful nation in the world, with possibly one exception—a nation of unlimited credit—a nation which has for years dominated and controlled the seas—a nation able to throw into South Africa an army of 250,000 men, which it promptly did, to grapple and combat these 25,000 inexperienced farmers.

The contest has been waged for two years. It is still being waged, and notwithstanding the fact that when one of the unfortunate Boers is stricken down no man is there to take his place, while when a British soldier is stricken down ten men can be immediately sent forward to supply the place made vacant by his death—notwithstanding these odds which have been against them the Boers have struggled and fought on and on and are still contending for the maintenance of their government.

May God give them strength to endure and fight on until every British soldier is driven from South Africa or every valiant Boer dies.

During the past two years we have heard much about Anglo-Saxon civilization—the Anglo-Saxon race, the race devoted to the principles of constitutional government, a race that has been persistently determined to maintain for itself self-rule—and yet, gentlemen, the anomalous spectacle is presented of the only English-speaking Government upon the Eastern hemisphere engaged in this struggle to destroy the only people on the Dark Continent who are endeavoring to maintain the right to govern themselves, and the only English-speaking Government on the Western hemisphere is engaged in attempting to suppress and beat down the first effort which is being made by a people in the Orient to govern themselves.

As a matter of fact, this is the tie that binds. Animated by unrighteous purposes, both Britain and America are engaged in unholy causes of conquest. We hear no word of sympathy upon the other side of the Chamber for these suffering Boers. Why is it? It is not because you do not love liberty; it is not because you do not sympathize with the dying women and children in the concentration camps in South Africa, for no man can make me believe that your kind hearts are not animated by the same impulses of humanity that move the hearts upon this side.

I could not be made to believe that you do not cherish in your souls the same noble affection for liberty that is entertained on this side. Yet you are silent. Why is it? Because you are sustaining an Administration whose policy it is to crush out the love of liberty in the Philippine Islands—suppressing and destroying a people who are endeavoring to control their own country. We are engaged in the same business as Britain.

The truth is a spirit of commercialism, which has marked the beginning of the decadence of every great nation, has taken possession of our people. I fear we have reached the period in our history when we love dollars more than we do right and justice, when we esteem conquest and power more than we do liberty and freedom.

But, gentlemen, I said there was no expression of sympathy on the other side. Permit me to retract that. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] on the 21st of last January introduced this resolution, and it does credit to his head and heart:

Whereas it is officially reported that the British military authorities in South Africa have passed and are about to execute sentence of death upon Commandant Scheepers, of the army of the Orange Free State;

Whereas said Commandant Scheepers, a subject of the Orange Free State, was captured while sick and wounded in hospital, and should therefore be considered especially entitled to all the privileges and exemptions of a prisoner of war;

Whereas his execution may lead to acts of retaliation and reprisal, and thus make more difficult and distant the prospect of peace;

Whereas the whole civilized world suffers from the effects of war waged between any of the family of nations; and

Whereas the people of the United States are moved by feelings of humanity in behalf of the sufferers from the terrible warfare now being conducted in South Africa: Therefore Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the British Government be requested to set aside the sentence of death passed upon Commandant Scheepers, and to accord him the customary immunities and privileges of a prisoner of war guaranteed under the Geneva Convention.

A similar resolution was introduced by the senior Senator from Colorado in the Senate, but it came too late. Permit me to read to you the finale of that unfortunate episode. Here is the story of a soldier who formed one of the hollow square inclosed in which Commandant Scheepers, the Boer patriot, met his doom:

Commandant Scheepers was shot at 3 o'clock. They brought him from town in an ambulance van, with a band playing and the firing party following behind. When they got him to his grave he begged to be allowed to stand up and face death, but they tied him down in a chair and blindfolded him. Then 15 of the Coldstream Guards stood 10 paces from him and fired. The volley was a sickening sight. He must have been a brave man; he did not flinch nor turn pale. They buried him as he was, and broke up the chair upon which he had sat, throwing the pieces on top of him.

When it is further added that the tune played by the band that convoyed Scheepers to death was a rollicking one, and that the victim at the time was suffering from severe wounds, the horror excited among the Boers by the execution may be imagined.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BURLESON. How this contrasts with the magnanimous treatment accorded by the Boers to the wounded English general, Methuen, when a captive in their hands! Too poor to give him proper medical treatment they returned him safely to the British lines, and yet our boasters and braggarts prate of Anglo-Saxon civilization, talk much of Christian charity, actually claiming the meek and lowly Nazarene as an exemplar for their conduct!

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I have no doubt that the requested permits will ultimately be secured, and that, too, through the good offices of our Secretary of State, but it will be through force of public opinion which lashes our laggard officials into action.

Theodore Roosevelt has done things of which I do not approve. There are many things he ought to have done as President which I believe he would have done if left alone, but which by reason of his environments he has failed to do. However, I would not be fair to myself if I did not express my belief that Mr. Roosevelt is a courageous, strenuous American. I believe that—and I now indulge a prophecy—in less than one year, yea, much less than one year, there will be another interchange of letters of regret between our President and another Cabinet minister, and our little pro-British Secretary of State, the little author of "Little Breeches," will follow other Cabinet ministers of a former President into the quiet of a private life. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield me some time?

Mr. HULL. How much time do you want—twenty minutes?

Mr. HITT. Oh, no.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois such time as he may desire.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it necessary to imitate the gentleman in repeating and again reading what the House has heard once or twice before. These letters have all been read and published and discussed before. They were promptly given to the press at the very instant they were indited by the enterprising young man whom the gentleman from Texas mentions so frequently. The action of the State Department, which the gentleman has denounced with such extreme vehemence as evasion, is, in fact, prompt and frank, as is apparent to anyone who will look a moment candidly at it.

A resolution was introduced making an inquiry of a Department. A copy, as is customary, was sent to the Department. The Secretary of State, instead of evading, answered immediately in a note which is before you, which compactly states the facts; and none of those long details and conjectures about what was requested for Mr. Thomas, which are read from letters in the newspapers and uttered by the gentleman, are necessary to know the simple facts. A request was made to the Secretary, first, for a passport. He said, "Yes," at once, and, more than that, "I will give letters to all those with whom I can have any influence to forward this work." "Inquiry was then made"—I quote the Secretary's letter—"whether this Government would ask of the British Government permission for Mr. and Mrs. Thomas to go at will through the British military lines and camps, a suggestion which I thought impracticable."

That was the necessary answer which would be given in such case. Permission could no doubt be obtained to visit those camps "under surveillance," as has been granted the Germans; and such permission would be given to anyone properly authorized presenting the request from the State Department or from our minister in London. The Secretary states further, showing his willingness to aid, that "he is ready at any time to consult with a representative of Governor Yates," and Governor Yates is the man who inspired and set in motion this whole work of contributions by people for the benefit of the distressed Boer prisoners, "as to the best means of getting into the proper hands the sums contributed by charitable people in Illinois for the relief of the sufferers by the war in South Africa." I have no official information as to any action that has taken place since. I have reason to believe that the wishes of Governor Yates and of that committee have been or are being discussed.

I do not know the state of affairs, but one of the gentlemen connected with the committee has said to me that they were in communication about it, and we may believe from the promptness with which the Secretary acted and the spirit that he has shown that the purposes of the good people to relieve the sadness and suffering in South Africa will be carried out. I do not wish to detain the House in further discussion dragging this matter out. It has been talked over at such length, with such repetition and such bitterness, that further talk does not add much. Our Government has repeatedly shown the sympathetic spirit that animates it toward the South Africans. We have offered our mediation when other nations did not. When it was refused, we have again and again in the most public manner that a national utterance can be given, stated our willingness to mediate again whenever we can to bring about peace or mitigate the sufferings that come from such a dreadful war. I do not think it necessary to answer the epithets and vituperations of the gentleman. I merely call attention to the statement of the real facts, embraced in this ten-line letter of the Secretary. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the American people have asked and are now asking why it is that the enormous appropriations for the military establishment of the Government show no signs of substantial diminution.

This bill carries with it the sum of $90,880,934.41, a little less than the amount carried for 1901, but larger than the amount appropriated for the year 1900. And this in spite of the fact that in the two preceding years large numbers of troops were quartered in Cuba and the insurrection in the Philippine Islands was flagrant. But now we will soon withdraw all our troops from Cuba, and we are told that conditions in the archipelago are highly favorable, that the majority of the provinces are pacified, and that armed resistance to our sovereignty is unorganized and confined to a few malcontents in remote regions from the city of Manila. In glowing terms we are told of the general peace which prevails, and yet we are to send and maintain under this bill a standing army in the islands of upward of 40,000 soldiers. But this is no new promise. We were told in the beginning that the insurrection, if such it can be called, would soon be quieted and that peace would prevail throughout the archipelago.

We have been told from time to time in the press dispatches, by military authorities and by our Republican friends, that these heavy burdens imposed upon the American taxpayer would be reduced; but we have spent in the hitherto vain attempt to subjugate the Christian people of these islands the stupendous sum of over $500,000,000, and yet the appropriations go on, the insurrection still lives, and whatever of peace prevails is at the point of the sword. Not only have these vast amounts been expended in the inglorious and unsuccessful effort in the East, but we have slain or wounded nearly 100,000 people whose sole affront has been that they sighed for liberty, and without it were ready to die. To accomplish this the American soldier has too often gone out full of promise and hope to find a grave in those unhappy and distempered islands or to return broken in spirit and wrecked in health to become an inert pensioner on the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, the time at my disposal is limited, and I do not purpose to enter into an extended or general discussion of this question, reserving this for a future time when the government bill relating to these islands shall be presented to the House for its consideration.

But I shall now submit a few remarks upon one feature of the situation there relating to the practice and continuation of human slavery, as an illustration of one of the many grave questions which the dominant party has forced upon the country in its great folly in the East.

In doing so I wish to correct the impression sought to be left by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who will soon be called to the head of the Navy, and who will, I am sure, worthily wear his great and new-found honor. In the course of his remarks early in the session he attempted to show that slavery did not exist in the Philippine Islands with the approval or consent of the United States Government. If the House will give me its attention, I shall undertake to show that not only does it exist with the approval and consent of the Government, but that it has been made and is now a participator and copartner in that iniquity.

Acting under orders from the President, General Otis, who was at the time military governor of the Philippine Islands, directed instructions to General Bates to enter into negotiations with the Sultan and the datos of the Sulu Archipelago with the ultimate object of entering into a "written agreement," subject to the approval of the authorities, and designated General Bates the "agent on the part of the United States military authorities in the Philippine Islands." The following is a part of the instructions:

The United States will accept the obligations of Spain under the agreement of 1878 in the matter of money annuities, and in proof of sincerity you will offer as a present to the Sultan and datos $10,000 (Mexican), with which you will be supplied before leaving for Jolo, the same to be handed over to them, respectively, in amounts agreeing with the ratio of payments made to them by the Spanish Government for their declared services. From the 1st of September next and thereafter the United States will pay to them regularly the sums promised by Spain in its agreement of 1878, and in any subsequent promises of which proof can be furnished.

The United States will promise, in return for the concessions to be hereinafter mentioned, not to interfere with but to protect the Moros in the free exercise of their religion and customs, social and domestic, and will respect the rights and dignities of the Sultan and his advisers. It promises not to interfere in their affairs of internal economy and political administration further than to respond to their requests for assistance, or to render supervisory action through advice and instruction in those special features of administration connected with the development of trade and agricultural resources, and the methods of conducting and employing the same for the improvement and efficiency of government.

It agrees to insure to the Sultan and his people the enjoyment of these rights and privileges against all foreign nations, and will declare all trade of the Sultan and his people with any portion of the Philippine Islands, conducted under the American flag, free, unlimited, and undisturbed. It demands, of course, the right to exercise control over the places within its actual occupation.

In return for these promised assurances, the Sultan and his chiefs, acknowledging the sovereignty of the United States, should stipulate to permit that Government to occupy and control such points in the islands as the execution of the obligations which it assumes makes necessary, whether for naval or military operations against foreign aggression or to disperse attempted piratical excursions. They should agree to accept and fly on all occasions, and continuously, the American flag, as the emblem and proof of United States sovereignty.

Armed with these instructions as the accredited agent of the Government, with the money furnished by General Otis, knowing full well that slavery existed throughout the Sultan's dominions, General Bates started upon his mission, the result of which was the celebrated treaty or agreement bearing his name.

In Senate Document No. 136, not furnished until February 1, 1900, after the Senate resolution of January 24, 1900, had been passed requesting its production, is found the reports relating to the culmination of this agreement, the American people being kept in entire ignorance of the facts up to that time.

A careful reading of the interviews between General Bates, the Sultan, and the datos, who are next in authority to the Sultan, discloses a state of facts in which a great government is made to play an undignified and puerile rôle, not to speak of its future responsibility arising from these unpardonable transactions.

If the situation was not one of the most grave import, the comical features of the daily peregrinations of General Bates about the ports of the archipelago and the reported dialogues between himself and the Sulu dignitaries would at least be amusing if not instructive. There are many instances, one of which I shall insert as a fair sample of our consideration toward the slaveholding Moros, and as showing the performance of our "Christian duty," about which our Republican friends are so wont to prate. The interview is as follows:

CONFERENCE BETWEEN GEN. J. C. BATES AND DATOS CALBI AND JOAKANAIN, HELD AT THE RESIDENCE OF DATO CALBI, NEAR JOLO, P. I., AUGUST 19, 1899.

GENERAL. Tell Dato Joakanain that we would have been down to see him at his own house, but we did not get back in time from our trip, and arranged to come here to-day, as we heard he would be at his brother's, and that the visit is to him as well as to his brother.

Say that we have been very glad to feel that both he and his brother are good friends to us, and we hope we will always keep good friends and be better friends.

Dato JOAKANAIN. He thanks you very much.

GENERAL. Tell him when my Government sent me down here they told me to make presents to those that I found were good friends, and I think he and his brother are good friends to us, and I want to make them a present from the Government. I am talking the same to both, Dato Calbi and himself.

You can also tell him we have enjoyed the races very much, and will be glad to see him to-morrow. Tell him I give them these because we regard them as friends.

(Each dato presented with flag and bag of pesos.)

Dato CALBI. They receive it with thanks. He says things are turned around. It was customary if people came from another country that they should take something away from it, and he says you have taken nothing from the country, but have given them something. He will take it, he says, because whatever he could give you would be worthless, and so he will not give you anything.

GENERAL. Tell him we want to build up a trade here. We want to sell American goods and buy what the Moros have to sell. We want to be good friends and expect to make our expenses that way, as this is the way Americans make their money, by increasing trade and improving conditions in the country.

Dato CALBI. He says he has got several daughters, but he is very glad to tell you to-day he got a son.

GENERAL. I congratulate him very heartily.

(Refreshments served.)

For the information of that part of the American people who may not know what a peso is, a bag of which was presented to these fortunate datos, I will explain by saying that it is a Spanish dollar, and that the flags presented were those which "should never come down." How like the Republican party this association of the flag and a bag of money! The old flag and an appropriation! It is little wonder that these particular datos are "pacified," and we behold their signatures to the infamous agreement which was shortly thereafter consummated.

These scenes were repeated, gifts of money and presentations of flags, "refreshments," and an era of brotherly love and good feeling begun, which up to this hour is still undiminished.

The Sultan himself seems to have resisted these blandishments for a while, but the redoubtable General Bates finally had an "interview;" the Sultan was presented with "several" American flags, $1,500 in money, and an agreement to pay him $250 per month indefinitely, and he, too, became "pacified" and a firm friend of the Government. The only apparent halt in these negotiations between General Bates and the Sultan was in regard to his own and the American flag, whether he should use his or our flag at his capital and on his excursions in the surrounding waters; but mutual concessions and forbearance settled this delicate international point of etiquette, and both were agreed to be flown, the Stars and Stripes just a little above the Sultan's flag.

Having settled this delicate point to his own satisfaction, and in a manner consonant with the "dignity" and "duty" of a great and beneficent government, General Bates and the Sultan had "refreshments" and parted the best of friends, the general sailing away to report the result of his arduous labors, leaving the Sultan, holding the American flag in one hand and a bag of silver in the other, to return to the ministrations of his slaves and the delights of the harem, and with a profound respect for the American Government and the uplifting force and beneficent influence of American institutions.

"How would you like to be the Sultan of Sulu?" would form a striking title for a comic opera, and Senate Document No. 136 would furnish all the material for a successful production.

Happy man! Joint sovereign with the United States Government; secure in his wives and concubines; his slaves unmolested; guaranteed protection in all his rights, temporal and spiritual; with American money to spend and the American flag to secure him and his numerous posterity forever in the enjoyment of these great and varied blessings. [Laughter and applause.]

The following is the treaty:

AGREEMENT

Between Brig. Gen. John C. Bates, representing the United States, of the one part, and His Highness the Sultan of Jolo, the Dato Rajah Muda, the Dato Attik, the Dato Calbi, and the Dato Joakanain, of the other part; it being understood that this agreement will be in full force only when approved by the governor-general of the Philippine Islands and confirmed by the President of the United States, and will be subject to future modifications by the mutual consent of the parties in interest.

ARTICLE I. The sovereignty of the United States over the whole archipelago of Jolo and its dependencies is declared and acknowledged.

ART. II. The United States flag will be used in the archipelago of Jolo and its dependencies, on land and sea.

ART. III. The rights and dignities of His Highness the Sultan and his datos shall be fully respected; the Moros shall not be interfered with on account of their religion; all their religious customs shall be respected, and no one shall be persecuted on account of his religion.

ART. IV. While the United States may occupy and control such points in the archipelago of Jolo as public interests seem to demand, encroachment will not be made upon the lands immediately about the residence of His Highness the Sultan unless military necessity requires such occupation in case of war with a foreign power; and where the property of individuals is taken, due compensation will be made in each case.

Any person can purchase land in the archipelago of Jolo and hold the same by obtaining the consent of the Sultan and coming to a satisfactory agreement with the owner of the land; and such purchase shall immediately be registered in the proper office of the United States Government.

ART. V. All trade in domestic products of the archipelago of Jolo, when carried on by the Sultan and his people with any part of the Philippine Islands, and when conducted under the American flag, shall be free, unlimited, and undutiable.

ART. VI. The Sultan of Jolo shall be allowed to communicate direct with the governor-general of the Philippine Islands in making complaint against the commanding officer of Jolo or against any naval commander.

ART. VII. The introduction of firearms and war material is forbidden, except under specific authority of the governor-general of the Philippine Islands.

ART. VIII. Piracy must be suppressed, and the Sultan and his datos agree to heartily cooperate with the United States authorities to that end, and to make every possible effort to arrest and bring to justice all persons engaged in piracy.

ART. IX. Where crimes and offenses are committed by Moros against Moros, the government of the Sultan will bring to trial and punishment the criminals and offenders, who will be delivered to the government of the Sultan by the United States authorities, if in their possession. In all other cases persons charged with crimes or offenses will be delivered to the United States authorities for trial and punishment.

ART. X. Any slave in the archipelago of Jolo shall have the right to purchase freedom by paying to the master the usual market value.

ART. XI. In cases of any trouble with subjects of the Sultan the American authorities in the islands will be instructed to make careful investigation before resorting to harsh measures, as in most cases serious trouble can thus be avoided.

ART. XII. At present, Americans or foreigners wishing to go into the country should state their wishes to the Moro authorities and ask for an escort, but it is hoped that this will become unnecessary as we know each other better.

ART. XIII. The United States will give full protection to the Sultan and his subjects in case any foreign nation should attempt to impose upon them.

ART. XIV. The United States will not sell the island of Jolo or any other island of the Jolo Archipelago to any foreign nation without the consent of the Sultan of Jolo.

ART. XV. The United States Government will pay the following monthly salaries:

	Mexican dollars.
To the Sultan	250
To Dato Rajah Muda	75
To Dato Attik	60
To Dato Calbi	75
To Dato Joakanain	75
To Dato Puyo	60
To Dato Amir Hussin	60
To Hadji Butu	50
To Habib Mura	40
To Serif Saguir	15

Signed in triplicate, in English and Sulu, at Jolo, this 20th day of August, A. D. 1899 (13 Arabul, Abril 1517).

JOHN C. BATES,

Brigadier-General, United States Volunteers.

Sultan of Jolo.
Dato Rajah Muda.
Dato Attik.
Dato Calbi & Dato Joakanain.

This treaty or agreement, Mr. Chairman, is not only wholly unworthy of our Government, but criminal as well, involving us, as it does, with the maintenance of the religion of the Moros, which recognizes slavery in all its varied forms, and their customs, which countenance polygamy.

But the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts read the letter of the Secretary of War, after this treaty was signed, addressed to General Otis, and which is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, October 27, 1899.

SIR: The President instructs me to advise you that the agreement signed August 20, 1899, between Brig. Gen. John C. Bates, representing the United States, of the one part, the Sultan of Jolo, the Dato Rajah Muda, the Dato Attik, the Dato Calbi, and the Dato Joakanain, of the other part, is confirmed and approved, subject to the action of Congress provided for in that clause of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain which provides, "The civil rights and the political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by Congress," and with the understanding and reservation, which should be distinctly communicated to the Sultan of Jolo, that this agreement is not to be deemed in any way to authorize or give the consent of the United States to the existence of slavery in the Sulu Archipelago, a thing which is made impossible by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

At the same time when you communicate to the Sultan the above-mentioned understanding, the President desires that you should make inquiry as to the number of persons held in slavery in the archipelago, and what arrangement it may be practicable to make for their emancipation. It is assumed that the market price referred to in the agreement of August 20, 1899, is not very high at present, and it may be that a comparatively moderate sum, which Congress might be willing to appropriate for that purpose, would suffice to secure freedom for the whole number.

It is needless to suggest that the inquiry should be prosecuted in such a way as not to create the impression that we now have authority to make such an arrangement, and in such a manner as not to create extravagant expectations.

Very truly, yours,

ELIHU ROOT,

Secretary of War.

Maj. Gen. E. S. OTIS,

Commanding United States Forces in the Philippines, Manila, P. I.

From this letter he derives the conclusion that the United States Government did not consent or approve the continuance of slavery in these islands, but how weak the position is when the treaty is approved, and not one thing has been done from the time it was signed up to the present to vary, alter, or modify a single term.

Of course the Secretary of War was compelled to say the Government did not recognize slavery. That was a fact before his letter of approval, and the statement of the Secretary did not make or change it, for the inhibition is written in the Constitution itself.

That the Constitution is opposed to slavery; that every good man, including the gentleman from Massachusetts, is needs nothing but the statement, but in spite of the Constitution—in gross disregard of it, to the shame of the American people—we have approved it, and are protecting it not only by a treaty but by subsequent promises not to interfere with the religion and customs of the Moros.

Long after the letter of the Secretary of War was written we find repeated assurances from Governor Taft that the Commission did not intend and would not interfere with the religious customs and tribal relations of the Moros. The following is an excerpt as published in the report of the Philippine Commission, page 106:

INTERVIEW OF COMMISSION WITH VARIOUS MORO DATOS.

COTABATO, Afternoon of April 2, 1901.

PRESIDENT (addressing Spanish interpreter). Say to him (Moro interpreter) that we would be glad if he would express to the datos who have honored us by coming here our pleasure in seeing them. Say to him that we come here with the friendliest feeling to continue the policy which has been introduced by the worthy military officers now in command; that we would not deprive a single Moro of a just right which he has heretofore enjoyed; that we are not here to take their country from them or to make profit out of them; that anything the Government of the United States may do here, through its representatives, will be directed solely to the prosperity and best interests of the Moro people; that we do not come here to interfere with their form of government, but only to see to it that justice is administered and that peace and equity are maintained; that nothing could be further from our purpose than an interference with their worship of God as they choose, according to their own religious beliefs; that the foundation stone of the American Republic is tolerance in religion, and the entire separation of church and state, and that the Moros will be left to practice their religious rites as they choose.

The history of article 10 is instructive. It was a subject of some controversy between General Bates and the Sultan whether the price at which the slaves could buy their freedom should be fixed at a definite figure or not, but the Sultan insisted that it should be at the "market price," and our agreeable and complacent agent, unwilling that so small a matter should interfere with amicable relations, consented to this proviso.

According to article 10 it will be seen that the slave working for nothing is secured in the inestimable privilege of purchasing his freedom, and we can better understand this boon which the American flag has brought to him when we are informed that he could have thus purchased his freedom long before the acquaintance of General Bates and the Sultan of Sulu was formed, and before the Stars and Stripes were apparent in the archipelago. An interesting problem in mathematics would be, How long would it take a slave working for nothing to buy his freedom at the "market price?"

And we may inquire of our Republican friends to-day, What is the "market price" of a slave in the Philippine Islands? What are the market quotations in the Sultan's price current?

Taking the Republican view, we have paid $20,000,000 to Spain for the whole Philippine Archipelago, which includes the Sultan's so-called dominions, and our title is indefeasible to the whole. Yet the United States Government is placed in the miserable attitude of negotiating with the Sultan for trading privileges, bartering with him for military positions of occupancy, just as if he was in fact a foreign potentate, and agreeing in return to protect him in the religion and customs of the Moros, as well as their tribal relations. And the unenviable position of the dominant party with reference to this treaty is that to free the slaves would be a gross breach of faith toward the people with whom the agreement was made, while if its continuance is permitted and protected, as it has been in the past and up to the present time, it is to bring dishonor on the nation and shame to all citizens of the Republic.

EXTENT OF SLAVERY, ITS CHARACTER, AND HOW SLAVES ARE OBTAINED.

In his evidence before the Insular Affairs Committee of the House Governor Taft estimated that there were from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand slaves in the Mohammedan countries of the archipelago, and, in addition, in the first volume of the United States Philippine Commission, page 38, he says:

It should be understood that slavery in the Philippines is by no means confined to the Moros. It is common among the wild Indonesian tribes in the interior of Mindanao and among the wild Malayan tribes of northern Luzon. If the evidence of credible witnesses is to be believed, some of the wild tribes of Mindanao sacrifice their slaves to propitiate their heathen divinities.

Governor Taft further stated in his testimony before the committee that the dato or master had the power of life and death over his slaves. In the second volume of the Philippine Commission Report, page 85, Maj. C. J. Sweet, an officer at Jolo, on March 28, 1901, testified, in response to inquiries by the commissioners, as follows:

SYNOPSIS OF INTERVIEW HAD BY THE COMMISSION WITH MAJ. O. J. SWEET, COMMANDING OFFICER, JOLO, P. I., MARCH 28, 1901.

In response to inquiries, Major Sweet stated as follows:

Slavery among the Moros originates in three ways—by capture, by debt, and by heredity. Practically all the slaves favor emancipation. Applications for freedom are received almost daily, eight or ten having been received within the past few days. Did not think the slaves were treated with great cruelty; at times were whipped and at times killed outright if they displeased the "datto." Being asked whether the slaves were used as concubines, he stated that the term "concubine" was a distinctive name applied to an attendant upon the women of the harem; that the concubine was often a slave. All female slaves, however, were always subject to the desires of the master; that was recognized by the Koran. Said that a slave followed the mother; could sell father without the mother. Understood there could be marriages between slaves by consent of owner. Did not understand that such consent deprived owner of right to sell father without mother.

In order to show that manumitted slaves may have an opportunity to rise, Major Sweet cites an instance as follows:

Manumitted slaves could rise to positions of trust and honor if they showed themselves competent. Cited the case of the man Janarin, who was a slave and notorious liar, whose mouth had been slit from ear to ear, but was subsequently, though a slave, placed in charge of a village to represent the business interests of his master; that is, to collect the tax levied upon the industries of the people.

From which we may infer that in order to fit a slave for a position of responsibility after his manumission it would be necessary to slit his mouth from ear to ear, or at least this operation would not interfere with his efficiency.

Major Morrison, in an interview by the Commission at Zamboanga, March 31, 1901, made the following statement as illustrative of this system:

Most of the Moros obtain slaves by stealing children or by making war and capturing them. I do not think the Zaboangans deal in slaves much. They are a different class from the others. The people of Iligan Bay made some trouble and captured some slaves, and one of their sultans was coming down here, and he brought a woman and two children to a little island up here and sold them to a Chinaman. An acquaintance of mine was in there one day and saw them. This man asked the Chinaman what he bought them for. "I am going to feed them for a few months and then get a good price for them," he replied. When I was down in Tawi Tawi they were selling girls 15 years old for from $5 to $15. I had a girl offered to me for $36 Mexican.

We must all agree that at some time, if we are to hold these islands as a permanent possession of the Government, slavery must cease, and that we will be compelled, as a matter of national honor, to exterminate it; and when that time shall come we will have a war of fanaticism with the Moros far more serious than that with the Christian Filipinos, and we can see in the future increasing appropriation bills for the Army and growing pension rolls as a result of the strange cruise upon which the Republican party has launched the ship of state.

Governor Taft, on this subject, in the first volume of the Philippine Commission Report, page 37, says:

An attempt at the present time to use force in securing the liberty of Moro slaves would inevitably provoke a fierce conflict with a brave and warlike people, and, so far as the slaves themselves are concerned, would meet with little appreciation. If, on the other hand, the refusal on the part of the Government to recognize slavery is persisted in, and the taking or purchasing of new slaves prevented, the question will settle itself in a generation without bloodshed or the bitterness necessarily engendered by an armed strife.

That these views of Judge Taft, to the effect that this question will settle itself, are not only optimistic, but will simply postpone the day when the conflict shall come, will be understood by every man who has studied this question or has any knowledge of Moro laws and customs.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I have not approached the discussion of this question from any narrow partisan standpoint, or to be understood as charging that either Governor Taft or the military authorities are in favor of a continuation of human slavery, but the facts do warrant the assertion made in the beginning, that it is being protected by the United States Government, and either silently or actively approved by every agent who has dealt with the question.

The facts laid before the country can not fail to inspire sentiments of the deepest concern to the American people.

If the observations of those not connected with the Government and who profess to speak from personal knowledge are true, they disclose a much worse state of affairs than here presented. But I have purposely refrained from coloring the situation by reading from other reports, but have contented myself with presenting the facts as gathered from the testimony of military officers taken by the Commission, and that of Governor Taft himself. I shall not stop now to contrast the harsh treatment of the Christian Filipino with the regard manifested by our Government toward the Mohammedan Sultan and the infamous system which is a part of his religion further than to say that if the Christian had received the same treatment as the Mohammedan much of ruin would have been prevented and much of treasure and human life would have been saved.

We appeal first to the dominant party to end this intolerable condition of affairs and demand that the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution be made as effective in the Philippine Islands as it is in the States of the Union. Failing in this, our next appeal will be to the American people to put a party in power pledged to the independence of the Christian peoples of those islands, and who will either wash its hands of this miserable business in the East or see to it that nowhere under the protection of the American flag shall a single human being be held in bondage. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will now use some of his time.

Mr. HULL. I do not know that we care to use over thirty minutes at the outside—to close.

Mr. SULZER. Well, if that is so, we will go on and consume all of our time.

Mr. HULL. If I should have any applications for time, I shall of course expect to come in whenever my friends want to speak. I do not surrender my rights.

Mr. SULZER. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KERN].

Mr. KERN. Mr. Chairman, when the proper time arrives under the five-minute rule I shall take occasion to offer the following amendment to this bill:

Provided, That the Secretary of War be instructed to authorize the reestablishment and restoration of the Army canteen as it existed under the rules in force previous to its abolition by Congress: And be it further provided, That the provisions of all acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The Army canteen, Mr. Chairman, which is sometimes called the "post exchange," was, as I understand the subject, nothing more or less than a place maintained by the regiments in our Army which desired to maintain it, at which refreshments and stimulants of the milder sort were served to the members of those regiments who were both willing and able to pay for what they received under the regulation and restraint of the military authority.

To say that these places were during the time of their existence disorderly; that they were the scenes of the drunken ribaldry, of disgraceful orgies, and of excessive indulgence in intoxicating drink, to the extent of making them injurious to the health and morals of our soldiers, is to impeach the character of the Army for efficient discipline and to characterize the military authority as weak and impotent.

I deny that in the period when the canteen was tolerated by the Department of War and when its operation was sanctioned by the military officers the discipline in the Army was more lax than it is now or that the government of the posts was lacking in that firmness and resolution which is so essential to the preservation of good order and the attainment of the highest degree of efficiency in the troops. Yet Congress has seen fit by legislative enactment to prohibit the continuance of the post exchange.

I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that this step was taken in obedience to a sentiment which aimed to bring about an entirely meritorious reform. It was done in the interests of sobriety and with a view of purifying the lives of the soldiers; with the view of improving their physical health, elevating their morals, and advancing the men who have enlisted to fight the battles of our country in an intellectual way. This commendable purpose no good man will try to bring into reproach by the use of either ridicule or criticism. Far be it from me to do so. It should be encouraged and upheld at all hazards. It should be made the guiding star not only in our military, but in our civil life. It furnishes a foundation strong enough and broad enough on which to build a nation. It should be the text of our most effectual sermons. It should be the gist and pith and core of the system of our universal education.

But I deny that the abolition of the canteen has established or even approached that much-to-be-desired condition of things. I assert, on the contrary, that the change involves a movement in the opposite direction. We have had a sufficient trial of both plans to place us into a position to form an intelligent judgment on this matter by calm analysis and fair comparison of the two. Instead of introducing habits of greater sobriety in the Army, the abolition of the canteen has substituted inebriacy for moderation in the use of intoxicants among the soldiers, periodical sprees for steady and noninjurious if not healthful indulgence. Instead of improving the health and morals of the soldiers, that move has proved fatal to both. Instead of improving the order of the Army posts, it has resulted in demoralization and wanton disobedience to the command. A fair trial of the new method ought to serve to convince reasonable men that the means employed are not merely ill suited to bring about the end aimed at, but that they are subversive and absolutely destructive of it.

The universal opinion from General Howard, that Christian soldier, down among all of our military men, and of the most keen observers on the outside of the military ranks, is that the prohibitory statute enacted against the post exchange was a grave mistake. Its theoretical object and ultimate purpose was no doubt to make total abstinents of the soldiers. This is a purpose which never was accomplished by law in the wide world since Adam fell. The attempt has been made over and over again, and over and over again has it failed. The statutory law in that instance conflicts with the natural and inalienable rights of the individual. For that reason it falls to the ground every time it is placed on the books, and becomes inoperative. That has been the fate of the prohibitory law in the Army. It has been the common fate, and ever will be the common fate of all such laws.

It is a fact which is of record that when the post exchange was abolished the men simply went outside the camp to get their refreshments, their stimulants, and their relaxation. The prohibition of the canteen did not make abstinents of them. Their personal liberty had been seriously abridged and ruthlessly tampered with, but the end aimed at was not attained.

They became the easy prey of unscrupulous dealers doing business on the immediate outskirts of the military camps who were after their pitifully small wages as the hawk is after its victim by selling them stimulants at exorbitant prices. The goods sold to the men under the operation of the departure are seldom of a high standard of excellence. As a rule they are vile decoctions, adulterated to increase profit, reeking with poisons which palsy and kill. The result is too well known to require specification before men of the intelligence and world knowledge which I am convinced the members of this House possess. Riot, disorder, brawls, suicides, murders, insanity—and this is a sad and deplorable fact—disease, and death are the inevitable consequences. These are the fruits of a blind and misguided zeal, the white-robed speculators of a vain and complacent fanaticism which has taken the place of reason and practical every-day common sense in the administration of our Army affairs.

Simply by way of emphasizing my contention I beg leave at this point to submit, for the consideration of this House, a press telegram from Omaha, Nebr., dated March 15, 1902. It is one out of many which have, during the last decade, appeared in the public prints throughout the length and breadth of this land. This was printed in the Chicago Chronicle, a newspaper of wide and general circulation and of acknowledged reliability so far as its news columns are concerned. With the indulgence of the House I shall read it:

OMAHA, NEBR., March 15, 1902.

A car of insane soldiers passed through the Union Station to-day. They were eighteen in number, and they are being sent from the Philippines to the soldiers' hospital at Washington. Every one of the eighteen is violently and incurably insane. Their wild, haggard faces peered menacingly through the windows of their coach, their manacled hands wildly threatened the on-lookers, and their fiendish shrieks and laughter echoed through the depot. Few of them were apparently diseased in body.

The maniacs were in charge of a squad of soldiers armed with clubs. The guards said, in reply to questions, that a consignment of a score or two score of maniacs from the Philippines was by no means unusual. The affliction is due either to the heat and unhealthy climate of the Philippines or the indulgence in the Filipino "vino" and other liquors sold there.

The malady is of a violent and persistent nature and will not respond to any treatment that has yet been discovered.

MEN RAVE LIKE BEASTS.

As the Union Pacific train from the West pulled into the station this afternoon there was a sound as of a menagerie approaching. The imprisoned men were chattering, snarling, moaning, and whining like wild beasts, and the noise was terrifying to the spectators.

Depot employees and trainmen who passed the car, not knowing of the presence of the maniacs, were greatly frightened when they heard a snarl of rage and then looked up into fiendish faces, which had their lips drawn back and teeth exposed. One unwitting man fainted from horror and fright and was compelled to receive medical aid.

ALL WEAR HEAVY IRONS.

The condition of the maniacs was pitiable in the extreme. All were absolutely mad and violent. Every one of them wore leg irons and handcuffs, and some were in strait-jackets and bound to their seats in the car. Most of them are young men.

Their car was turned over here to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul road, which will take it to Chicago.

Reestablish the Army canteen and your cases of pitiable insanity caused by the consumption of the vile and death-dealing "vino and other liquors sold" in the Philippines will no longer disgrace our Army records or mar the pages of our public journals to stand as a rebuke to proud, manly, liberal, self-respecting, and patriotic Americans. [Applause.]

This question of the sale and use of intoxicating beverages can be regulated by discreet and wise action; but it can not be settled with hammer and tongs and prohibition laws, and its proper solution can not with safety be left to the impractical and inexperienced nor to unreasoning zealots with a cause to promote by any sort of partisan trickery or political bulldozing. The testimony of experienced Army officers is solidly against them on this matter. The common sense of this entire nation is against them. The heart and the brain of every boy in blue is against them.

In the post exchange none but goods of attested purity and the best quality were sold to the men. The medical authorities in the Army saw to that. That was not sold to them in excessive or injurious quantities. The officers of the Army saw to that. The milder class of stimulants only was dispensed to the men at the canteen. The rules provided for that. When a man was found to be drinking to excess, to the extent of showing signs of intoxication, he was unceremoniously hustled to his quarters, an eye was kept on him in the future, and he was punished for his indiscretion.

At all times he remained under the observation of his superiors. When he became lost to his sense of responsibility he found himself in charge of comrades with authority over him who were in full possession of their reason and who were fully responsible for their acts and alert to preserve the order, the honor, and the good name and character for decency of the camp. Furthermore, the incentive for selling to the soldiers in excessive quantities was entirely removed. No individual made any profits by the sale. These went into the hands of trusted officers who expended the proceeds impartially among the men for more palatable and more abundant rations.

Many a highly appreciated dainty was purchased with the seemingly trifling surplus of the canteen which made many a poor heart glad and shed one ray of welcome sunlight into its homesick and disconsolate recesses. Under the same provision the incentive of overcharging the soldier was wholly wiped out. So that the Army canteen was the greatest promoter of temperance which the posts have ever known. It was the best safeguard to the health and the morals of the men. It dealt with conditions and with human nature as it found them, in the most sane and sensible way. It preserved the order and elevated the dignity of the camp. It recognized the individual liberties of the men; and let no man contend that they surrendered these when they donned the uniform to brave the dangers of hell in defense of the flag of our great country. [Applause.]

A soldier is not a convict. He does not enter the gates of a penitentiary when he enlists in the Army. If true, self-reliant, honorable manhood is needed anywhere it is in the Army. All of the liberty compatible with efficient military discipline belongs to the soldier, and it should be sacredly preserved for him. He does not surrender his tastes or his appetites when he dons the uniform, and reasonable and tolerant men do not expect him to do so. Nor can he change his habits of life in an hour. Perhaps he is not willing to change them. The strongest ties that bind human society together are the habits of the people. They can not be broken by caprice nor by a pet fad. They are bands of most tenacious steel, and it takes as many centuries of persistent hammering to break them as it took ages to forge and mold them. May that day be far off when the habits of liberty, loved and worshiped by the American people, are crushed under the iron heel.

The sentiment which bids us go forth to our cemeteries where rest the heroes who have kept our flag in the sky on the 30th day of May each year, to do them reverence and commemorate their deeds by laying flowers on their tombs, marked and unmarked, of the known and the unknown dead, is a tender and touching one, which does honor to us as a nation and which should be perpetuated as long as the words liberty, justice, and equality are inscribed on our standard (applause); but while we should weep for the fallen, and while we should keep their graves green and bury them each year, again and again, beneath the wealth of spring, with sprigs and garlands borne by willing hands to their silent chambers of dreamless rest, we should not forget the earthly needs and the human wants of the living in our tearful sympathy and endearing solicitude for the dead.

On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

Believe me, my colleagues, as soon as you abridge the personal liberty of the soldiers of this Republic beyond the point of human endurance and in wanton violation of our sacred traditions of liberty, you deter the flower of America's manhood from carrying arms under the flag.

Carrying arms! Would the time were past when man's inhumanity to man makes it necessary for anyone to carry arms. I wish there were no more wars. Would that bright day had come and that golden era been reached when we could discharge the whole Army and apply the immense sums of money which these bills appropriate to some useful and humanitarian purpose. Were we honest and sincere in practicing what we preach there would be no more human blood voluntarily shed.

Ez fer war, I call it murder;
There you hev it, plain and flat.
I don't want to go no furdur
Than my Testymnt fer that.

I sometimes wish that the very word war were obsolete, particularly when I reflect on the kind of miserable, inglorious, land-grabbing, and liberty-destroying warfare we are engaged in carrying on now in the distant islands of the somber sea. I wish the very word were obsolete as it is applied to the kind of murderous and exterminating warfare which our so-called mother country is carrying on in the interests of despotism, tyranny, and red-robed kingcraft in the Transvaal.

But as long as you do need soldiers treat them as men, endowed with all the attributes of a sturdy and robust manhood while they are living; not only as heroes when they are dead. They fight the battles of our country. They face the dangers of the field. They endure the hardships of the camp. They make the long and weary marches. They defy the fiercest elements. They say the long, perhaps the last, good-by to the loved and loving ones at home. They carry the flag and keep the old banner in the breeze. They leave their blood, their limbs, their lives on sanguinary battlefields. They suffer untold agonies in the hospitals of pain. They cheerfully lay all they have on earth on the altar of their country in willing sacrifice. Then let them enjoy some of the comforts—some of the sweets mixed with the hardships, the perils, and the bitterness of life.

In God's name do not deny to them what you demand for yourselves, my colleagues. You have your canteen. Nobody molests it. The Senate has its canteen. No one disturbs that. Then let the soldiers of this Republic have and enjoy their canteen unmolested and undisturbed. Restore to them the personal liberty which you have taken away from them. Protect them against the leeches, the tin-horn gamblers, and the prostitutes who linger around the Army camps to fleece and rob them. Have some regard for their health, their comfort, and their moral being. Let them be American freemen, proud of the flag under which they are fighting, imbued with an unwavering love for the country they gave up home to serve in obedience to all commands. In this spirit of entire toleration and perfect fairness, and with this purpose of promoting the cause of true temperance among our soldiers and preserving their personal liberty, I shall submit this amendment for your candid consideration. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, there is no disinterested citizen who has observed the enormous growth in the appropriations in this country for the last thirty years, and especially for the last five years, who does not stand amazed at its proportions.

There is a general tendency in all branches of the Government toward extravagance rather than economy. The old doctrines, founded in wisdom and right, that the Government should be economically administered and that taxation should be limited to the amount found necessary for this purpose, have no place in the modern statesmanship of the dominant party.

That Federal taxation and extravagant expenditures have reached the limit of endurance a brief comparison with the former history of the Government will clearly establish.

I desire to submit a statement of the comparative expenditures of the Government for ten-year periods, beginning with the year 1840, and giving the sum total for each of these years, as well as the amount per capita of the population.

The following table shows the amounts expended for the years mentioned:

Year.	Net expense.	Amount per capita.
1840.....	$24,317,579.00	$1.42
1850.....	39,543,492.00	1.71
1860.....	63,130,508.00	2.01

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that $800,000,000 will meet the obligations that have been and will be decreed by this session of Congress. I feel quite certain that this amount is not an extravagant estimate.

We have in the United States and Territories at this time, in round numbers, 22,000,000 male population over 21 years of age.

So it will be seen that the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1903 will be equal to a charge of $36.36 against every man in the United States over the age of 21 years. This is more than twice as much as the cost of the Government for the year 1890, 12 times as much as it cost for the year 1860, and 30 times what it cost for the fiscal year 1840. These figures speak for themselves and need no comment to warn the taxpayer what may be expected from a continuance of the highest tariff laws that ever existed in this country.

When the amounts collected from the people through the taxing laws of the Government are in excess of the legitimate demands of the Government and a large and growing surplus accumulates in the Treasury, one of three things must happen—either the taxes must be reduced or the expenditures must be increased or the surplus paid upon the national debt, so as to absorb the continual accumulations in the Treasury. Then of necessity all those interests that enjoy protection at the expense of the people under the tariff laws, in order to perpetuate the bounties they enjoy, are especially interested in the expenditure of the public moneys. I think I may safely say that this will account for many of the schemes now being pressed before Congress asking for appropriations and throw light upon many of the expenditures made.

Take as an illustration the course of our Government in the Philippines. Who is it that would be bold enough to assert that if the Supreme Court had decided in the insular cases—as many of us believe that they ought to have done—that Congress had no right to impose tariff taxes on imports from those islands that the Republican party would not now be favoring the relinquishment of that country to the people thereof?

The policy pursued in the Philippine Islands since the conclusion of peace with Spain has furnished the excuse for not only continuing the trust-breeding tariff but the war taxes long after they might have been repealed. That policy, Mr. Chairman, has not only been a great wrong upon the people, but it has been a most expensive one on this country, both in men and money.

Now, more than three years since the conclusion of the peace treaty with Spain, we still have an army there greater than the standing army of the United States at the beginning of the war with Spain. More than 30,000 men are there, at a cost of over $50,000,000 annually, and no man can predict when it can be materially reduced if the present policies are pursued.

I do not intend to enter into a general discussion of the policies being pursued there in that far-off land, except in so far as it is necessary to show its cost to the people of this country. No absolutely correct estimate can be made, but I believe everyone will concede that $300,000,000 is not only conservative, but is a low estimate of actual expenditures on account of our army in the Philippines. This may seem a trifling amount to some, but to men who earn their livelihood by daily toil, and contribute more than their share to the payment of these moneys its amount can be appreciated.

It is estimated that the cost of the Revolutionary war was $135,193,703; the war with Great Britain, in 1812, $107,159,103; the war with Mexico, $100,000,000. Total cost of these wars, $342,352,806. These three wars combined with their wonderful achievements cost but little more, indeed, if any more, than we have already expended in the senseless attempted subjugation of the Filipinos. But this is not all the cost. Our army there is giving us a pension roll that will last for half a century.

There have already been allowed something over 500 pensions, and there are pending over 4,500 more claims originating from service in the Philippines, and the number is rapidly increasing. What total sum this will cost in the end no one can tell, but that it will run into many millions is apparent.

Not only this, Mr. Chairman. This policy made the excuse for increasing the standing Army from 25,000 men to an army of 100,000 when at its maximum, and which can not under existing law be reduced below 59,181.

When will these expenditures cease? No one dare predict. The partisan press tells us that the war in the Philippines is over. No one believes this, and, judging from proposed legislation, it is not expected to end for a long time. The general opinion is that for at least ten years we will be compelled to keep an army of from 25,000 to 30,000 men there.

In the urgent deficiency bill, which passed the House some weeks ago, $500,000 was appropriated for the establishment of a military post near Manila. The pending bill appropriates $1,500,000 for the shelter and protection of soldiers on duty in the Philippines. These items show beyond doubt that we may expect our army to remain in that country for years to come if the present policies are not repudiated by the people. I will submit at this point statement of expenses of military establishment since 1890.

Statement of expenditures on account of "Military establishment" (support of the Army and Military Academy), for the fiscal years 1890 to 1901, inclusive.

1890	$23,961,300.95
1891	25,344,199.73
1892	23,404,533.83
1893	23,377,828.35
1894	23,635,153.16
1895	23,032,746.34
1896	24,046,264.22
1897	22,519,606.01
1898	55,520,884.07
1899	234,480,206.51
1900	96,484,226.06
1901	105,702,101.02

Total	681,530,062.25
Amount appropriated for 1902	116,728,655.62
Amount for 1902 (estimated)	99,849,436.45

Now, Mr. Chairman, returning to the many plans at home—in our own country—asking admission to the public Treasury, I desire to call attention to the universal demand for the increase of salaries of Federal officers. In this connection I call attention to the bill to increase the salary of the Supreme Court judges, which has already passed the Senate.

This bill, if it becomes a law, will give the Chief Justice, who now receives $10,500, a salary of $13,000 per annum and each of the eight associate justices, who now receive $10,000, a salary of $12,500 per annum. These men hold their offices for life, and at the age of 70 may retire from duty and continue to draw their salaries during life. Under these circumstances I believe their salaries are already high enough and should not be increased. I think any lawyer who will read the decisions of this great court on the insular cases will decide that they are now overpaid, at least some of them.

A bill is also pending to increase the salary of Senators and Representatives to $7,500 per year. This bill should not pass, and I know it will not if I can prevent it. These bills show the general tendency in every department of this Government.

Another evidence of not only extravagance, but special and unjust legislation, is the ship-subsidy bill. This bill has passed the Senate and is now pending in this House. Not desiring to discuss it at this time, I will only say that it is a bold attempt to transfer $100,000,000 from the pockets of the people to the favored ship-owners, and the party responsible for its enactment, in the event of its final passage, will witness the transfer of power to enact laws to other hands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming to the direct cause of this condition of affairs in public legislation, I attribute it in its inception and growth largely to our present system of taxation.

When the first law was passed authorizing a tax not for the purpose of raising revenue but for protecting special interests, the seeds were sown from which we are now reaping the ripened fruit. Not only in burdening the people with overtaxation, but in compelling them to pay tribute out of their honest earnings to the most gigantic trusts that ever disgraced not only a free government but any government on the face of the earth. You can not turn your attention to any line of manufacturing industries without being confronted with combinations seeking to control and monopolize such industries.

Indeed, there is hardly a single important industry in the whole country free from the dominating influence of this evil in our commercial life. No man who has not given the subject more than passing attention can appreciate the stupendous proportions of these combinations in the last few years and especially since the enactment of the Dingley tariff law.

I will at this point submit a summary or statement recently appearing in the New York Journal, the accuracy of which will not be doubted, showing the organization of these combinations for the years 1900 and 1901.

The summary shows the capitalization for each month of the current year, with comparisons for 1900:

Month.	1901.	1900.
January	$105,250,000	$203,750,000
February	79,500,000	124,350,000
March	190,500,000	502,900,000
April	1,314,150,000	325,250,000
May	177,980,000	261,600,000
June	303,200,000	166,200,000
July	238,325,000	185,700,000
August	57,450,000	99,900,000
September	66,800,000	90,700,000
October	164,600,000	128,950,000
November	508,850,000	105,775,000
Total	3,205,605,000	2,255,075,000

These figures are not only startling but demonstrate that unless checked by national legislation these trusts will soon control with an iron hand the various interests covered by their monopolies and leave the people the helpless victims of their remorseless greed.

Mr. Chairman, I will at this point call the attention of the House to the profits disbursed in dividends during the year 1901, which amounts to a grand total of $238,830,633.

The following statement will give their dividends more in detail:

INDUSTRIAL DIVIDENDS IN TWELVE MONTHS AMOUNT TO ALMOST A QUARTER BILLION DOLLARS—THE DECEMBER DISBURSEMENTS.

The disbursements for dividends by industrial corporations in December amounted to $17,991,933. Nearly two-thirds of this total is due to the Standard Oil Company and the United States Steel Trust, which will jointly pay their stockholders $12,889,638.

The grand total for twelve months is $238,830,633, as will be seen from the subjoined summary:

January	$29,915,740
February	11,450,630
March	26,166,430
April	24,913,380
May	9,338,320
June	19,100,830
July	23,204,080
August	16,523,754
September	$19,436,034
October	23,016,608
November	17,772,834
December	17,991,933

Total..... 238,830,633

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to two of these organizations, the Northern Securities Company, with a capitalization of $400,000,000, and the United States Steel Company, with a capitalization of $1,404,000,000. The first named was organized for the purpose of controlling and dominating a great railroad combination, and if it succeeds will open the way for the complete consolidation of the great railways of the country. The evils to follow from the consummation of this plan can only be measured by the demands of such combinations and the evils of freight discrimination and excessive freight charges, although in many instances now intolerable, will be multiplied many times over. I can not now go further into the discussion of this organization in line with what I wish to say, but I will content myself by now stating that the party in control of the affairs of this Government, by refusing to legislate against this threatened crime against the commerce of the country, are taking upon themselves a fearful responsibility—one that must in the near future prove the undoing of the Republican party or end in the complete overthrow of the rights of the people.

The United States Steel Company, organized for the purpose of dominating and controlling the iron and steel industries of the country, is the greatest single trust in the world.

I refer to the following statement in the report of the Director of the Census for 1900, showing its total capitalization and also the different companies that have been absorbed by it and the total capitalization of each of the constituent companies:

	Total authorized capitalization.
United States Steel Corporation .....	$1,404,000,000
Constituent companies:
Total .....	829,494,000
The Carnegie Company .....	160,000,000
American Bridge Company .....	70,000,000
Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines .....	30,000,000
Federal Steel Company .....	200,000,000
American Steel and Wire Company of New Jersey .....	90,000,000
National Tube Company .....	80,000,000
National Steel Company .....	63,494,000
American Sheet Steel Company .....	53,000,000
American Tin Plate Company .....	50,000,000
American Steel Hoop Company .....	33,000,000
Shelby Steel Tube Company .....

The net earnings of this company for the nine months ending December 31, 1901, amount to the fabulous sum of $84,779,298.

Mr. Chairman, all the products manufactured or controlled by this trust are among those protected by the highest tariff rates contained in the Dingley law, giving it the power to hold up the American consumer like a highwayman, while its products are shipped to foreign countries and sold for a far less price than our own people can buy them at the factory door.

At this point I desire to call attention to statements made in a recent Republican caucus by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. DICK, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. LITTLEFIELD. These statements appearing in the city press the next morning, I assume that they were authorized or are substantially correct.

The statement of the gentleman from Ohio is reported as follows:

A statement made by Mr. DICK, of Ohio, in the conference Tuesday is causing much comment, as respects the need of tariff revision for steel and iron schedules. Mr. DICK announced that he had recently received a letter from a prominent manufacturer of mowers and agricultural implements at Akron, declaring that he was now buying the large quantities of steel which he uses annually in Europe. This is American steel, but Mr. DICK's correspondent said that he could buy this steel in Europe, pay the duty thereon and the freight back to Akron, cheaper than he could buy identically the same article in Pittsburg.

The statement of the gentleman from Maine is reported as follows:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD'S argument was largely a legal one, and commanded the closest attention. He denied that we could guarantee a stable government for Cuba. That was more than the United States could do for any one of the States. We could guarantee a constitutional form of government for one of the States; nothing more. He warned the Republican protectionists that the time was not far distant when tariff revision would come. He told how American steel cost $1.65 in Maine shipyards, while the identical kind of American steel could be bought in England for 95 cents. If the high-tariff Republicans of the House now heeded not the appeal of the beet-sugar industry for protection, they could expect little help or sympathy when their own Macedonian cry went up.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I quote these statements from these two eminent Republicans and stalwart protectionists with the hope that they may carry conviction home even to the disinterested protectionist that at least this mammoth trust, the United States Steel Company, does not need the protection of the tariff. It is matter of common information that many articles controlled by the trusts can be bought in foreign markets from 20 to 50 per cent cheaper than they can be bought at the factory doors in this country.

If American steel costs in this country $1.65 when the identical kind of American steel can be bought in England for 95 cents, no man can well afford to insist that this trust ought longer to be allowed to fleece the American consumer.

This condition is true not only as to steel, but equally true as to hundreds of other articles of commerce that enter into the daily needs of our people.

These monopolies are completely protected against foreign competition in our own markets by the high tariff rates that must be paid upon foreign goods before they can enter into our markets.

They have, by consolidations, destroyed competition at home, and can with impunity add practically the rate of tariff duties to the selling price in the home markets, and the people are powerless in their hands unless relief is given by legislation.

The remedy in most instances is simple—remove the tariff from trust-made and trust-controlled articles and commodities and you will break the shackles from the hands of the American consumer and independent industries and strike the trusts a staggering blow. Why not do it? Why should the American consumer be longer held in bondage to such monopoly? Who can justify his own course before the people that refuses to join in the struggle to right this indefensible wrong? Where is the man that can justify a condition that will admit of the sale of American goods in foreign markets, and at a profit after paying freight, cheaper than the same article can be bought in our own market by our own people? This injustice, this iniquity and open robbery can not be justified upon any ground. It is indefensible and intolerable.

This condition has been brought about by Republican legislation. The same party that is now in power is directly responsible for it. They brought it into existence by legislative favoritism. They loved and protected it, and they are now maintaining and defending it. It is vain and useless for the people to hope and expect relief at their hands. They are powerless to grant it. The slavery of those who dominate that party to monopoly is complete and they can not extricate themselves from its grasp, and their overthrow must precede the overthrow of the trusts.

Great as that party claims to be, it can not agree upon any fair or liberal trade relations with Cuba. That this great party has on its hands now one of the greatest contests within its ranks that has threatened the harmony of its councils in years over a proposition to reduce the tariff rates in favor of Cuba 20 per cent of the Dingley rates for only two years upon her making like concessions in our favor. The principal produce of the island is sugar, and the existing rate of duty is equivalent to 86 per cent ad valorem. Yet the Republican majority are unable to agree to this, which will be of little benefit to either country.

In my opinion simple justice demands that a much larger concession should be made. Not only justice but good judgment in the interest of our own commerce demands it. Notwithstanding this, the party in power halts and hesitates, and in the end will fail to permit any legislation to pass that will materially benefit Cuba or our commerce with her.

Mr. Chairman, the issue as to the trusts is not one so much between the friends of a tariff for revenue only and those who believe in a protective tariff as formerly taught as it is an issue between honesty and dishonesty, between fair dealing and open robbery, between the sovereign people on one side and unbridled and unrestrained monopoly on the other side. Shall the great trusts and aggregations of capital continue to be protected by the tariff while they destroy the country and ride down the people? is the question.

Can the followers of the Republican creed of protection be longer deluded into the support of that doctrine—the protection to these enemies of the people? Let the rank and file of that party answer. Let the destroyed competitor answer. No effective or sincere efforts of those in control of the legislation in this or the last Congress has been made looking to the destruction of these trusts. None will be made by them at this session. But, Mr. Chairman, the day of reckoning is near at hand. The people are growing restless and resentful. They are alarmed for the safety of themselves and their industrial institutions. They witness with disapproval the wasteful and reckless expenditure of the public money.

They are already convinced of the unholy alliance of selfish interest and are resolving upon its overthrow.

Those who stand for just and equal legislation, with equal privileges to all and economy in public expenditures, are enlisting under that banner. The merchant, the farmer, the laborer, and all who believe in just government are equipping themselves for the conflict, and when the contest is over the doctrine of equal rights and privileges for all and economy in the public expenditures, and that taxation should be limited to the needs of the Government, economically administered, will again prevail in this country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may want to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], a member of the committee.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, we have under discussion to-day the Army appropriation bill. It appears that the bill last year carried an appropriation of $115,734,049.10. The bill this year carries an appropriation of $90,880,934.41, in round numbers $25,000,000 less this year than it was last year.

It is true, gentlemen of the House, that this bill to-day is much larger in appropriations than it was when I first entered in the Fifty-fourth Congress. It was my privilege then to come at a time when one branch of the Government service was in control of our friends upon the other side of the Chamber. Two years later the party to which I belong came into control of all branches of the Government.

I remember very well, as if it were only but yesterday, the intense feeling and interest in this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress. It was not confined to the other side of the Chamber, but it was on this side of the Chamber as well. The sentiment was not only here in this legislative hall, but it was throughout the country on the part of the people, that something should be done to relieve Cuba. I remember very well how we marched in and out of the various conferences and caucuses on this side urging and insisting that the President of the United States should do something toward the relief of Cuba. I now recall in substance some of the words that I heard the distinguished President of the United States—who had been a soldier in the civil war, who had gone forth as a mere lad of 17 years of age, who had bid his neighbors and friends good-bye, who had kissed the dear mother that he loved so well, who knew what war was—make use of then. He said that we could easily succeed in war, but the results would be unpalatable to many of our people.

He stood against war in those days, because he thought this whole question of the disturbance in Cuba could be settled by honorable and peaceful means. But it had been decreed otherwise, gentlemen of the House. The people demanded that we should go and relieve and free Cuba. There was no purpose in the mind of the President or anyone at that time, nor is there now, to obtain Cuba by force of conquest. But we went to war, and we succeeded very quickly. Our armies upon the sea and land were covered with glory. The world looked to the young republic, and by leaps and bounds we became one of the foremost, if not the foremost, nation in the world; and then there came upon us the results of that war. Let me say to you it was not a party war. Cuba was relieved of Spanish rule; Porto Rico fell into our hands, and there came into our hands also the archipelago where the Philippine Islands are located.

This is not a party question, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives should not discuss this question as a party question. We are here representing a great people, with a great representative duty to perform, and let us move along as representatives in this great body with a knowledge of this question that we are discussing. Porto Rico and the Philippines now belong to us. Cuba, we said, "is and of right ought to be a free and independent people." On the 20th of May, 1902, Cuba will take her place as an independent people. The resolution that we passed in this House by practically a unanimous vote, as I recall it, will be consummated on the 20th of May, 1902.

How have we acted in the case of Porto Rico? We have given that island a form of self-government. Her executive officers are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The executive council is appointed by the President, but the legislative body is selected by the people of that country.

Now, as to the Philippines. As the representatives of a great people—representing a people the greatest on earth—what should we as representatives do with this question? It is for us to discuss this question, and as a result we shall have to go before our people and render an account of our stewardship in reference to those islands. Have we mistreated those people in any way? Who is there in this Hall or elsewhere to say that the American people, by arms or by civil force in the Philippines, have laid a harsh hand on those people? There are 8,000,000 of them—1,000,000 Moros and non-Christians, 7,000,000 believing in the same religion that we believe in, worshiping the same God, recognizing the same Master.

Have we borne heavily upon them by law or by force of arms? Who says that we have? We have been conducting ourselves in that island in a humane and Christian manner, as far as it was possible. Their schools are moving successfully along. We are holding out to those people inducements to expect that they will have a form of government given to them as rapidly as it is possible for them to accept it and maintain it and use it. We are recommending—and, in my judgment, it will pass in this Congress—a form of civil government. They will have an executive head, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They will have an executive, council selected by the President of the United States—perhaps the members of the Commission already constituted. They will have an elective body similar to the legislative bodies throughout this country.

But, my fellow-members, what have they there? There are 34 provinces where the electors choose through proper channels the men to preside over them. There are 500 municipalities similar to municipalities in our own country. There will be formed among those islands a central form of government, similar, perhaps, to the Congress of the United States, to which those men will send their representatives, chosen by their own electors, whose right to vote will be prescribed perhaps along the line of intelligence and property. And there should be permitted to come to this legislative body as Delegates from that archipelago three representatives, to tell us of the condition of the people there—what they want and what they need.

These are the lines along which we are moving. These are the ideas which will be crystallized in legislation, no doubt, before this Congress closes. Have you ever thought, my fellow members, that no country in the world under any form of government has ever pointed the finger of reproach to the United States in regard to its treatment of the Filipinos? It has been left for men of this country alone to criticize our action there as a great people. The world has never said that we have been harsh or cruel to them. In the heat of party politics perhaps at times we have said things that we ought not to have said; but the world, which is the best judge of our actions—the civilized and Christian world that is represented in Continental Europe, Great Britain, and in other portions of the globe—has never found fault with the conduct of the United States toward Cuba or Porto Rico or the Philippines. That to my mind is the best and highest evidence that we have been moving along the lines of a Christian nation, sustained by the voice of a Christian people. The conduct of men who are here representing our people in legislative halls has been approved by the people of this country and by the people of the world.

So it seems to me that, irrespective of party lines, we can render an account of our stewardship to the voters this fall in regard to our treatment of the Filipinos, the Porto Ricans, and the Cubans. I have heard no fault found thus far, aside from a little questioning here and there. And I ask you, fellow-members, not to consider any party lines in dealing with this question. Consider your oath of office; consider what you have said you would do to maintain this Government and all its colonies—if you see fit to call them colonies—or its dependencies, its insular possessions—if you see fit so to call them. Remember that they are part of your possessions as well as ours. Remember it is yours as well as ours, and ours as well as yours. There is no party line that should be drawn. It is part of our duty as representatives of a great people to see to it that the men in those islands who are wearing the uniform of the United States and maintaining our flag, as well as those in civil positions, shall be sustained, their hands upheld in all they are doing for the betterment of this people and the betterment of the world. This is what I ask you to do, and when you consider the question in the line of your duty as men you will not give to anybody here or elsewhere any encouragement to resist the lawful, honorable government enacted in the Philippines. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAZEALE].

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Chairman, we have been informed that the Naval Committee of this House, by a recent strict party vote, has concluded not to report any of the pending bills relative to the status of Admiral Schley, and that it will no longer consider that subject. I regret exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, that that great committee should have reached that conclusion. I have not seen nor have I heard the reasons that induced that conclusion, but I take it for granted that the reason given or the reason actuating them will be found in the closing paragraph of President Roosevelt's judgment on what is known as the Schley appeal. He closes with these words:

To keep it alive would merely do damage to the Navy and to the country.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that no reason of State or other reason should operate to prevent the rectification of an injustice done. I submit that before the country, before the world, Admiral Schley stands to-day as being the victim of one of the greatest and most cruel injustices ever perpetrated upon a gallant man. I submit again that, if it be true that the Naval Committee representing, as it is presumed to represent, the judgment or opinion of this House, it is deplorable in the extreme that it did not give this House an opportunity to express its opinion by vote on that subject. I do not believe it is right to deny a free and fair expression of opinion upon any question, and especially upon a question in which all the people, the whole people of this great country, are so directly interested.

The people of this country are generous. They are courageous.

They believe in fairness, and they believe that if one man more than another is entitled to that great victory at Santiago it is Winfield Scott Schley. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Admiral Schley stands in a horrible predicament. He stands convicted by the highest executive officer of this Government—convicted in the most remarkable judgment that ever has been given to the public on any question. I dislike to criticize as severely as I would desire that judgment because the inherent respect I have for the high station of Chief Executive of the nation circumscribes the plain expression of my opinion, and I desire in what criticism I may make of him to do so with dignity and with a proper regard for the proprieties.

Let us look at it now as laymen, as nonprofessionals, as people who know nothing of the technique of naval warfare. Let us look at it from the standpoint of fairness and of justice, and let us see what has been decided in that opinion. It has been charged, or rather insinuated, that this prosecution of Admiral Schley is the result of a cabal or conspiracy in naval circles. Of that I know nothing. I wish we could get at the bottom of it, and I believe if the Naval Committee of this House would permit us to go into that question by reporting some of these bills we could get at the merits of that charge and lay bare that conspiracy.

But what says President Roosevelt? He weighs with exact mathematical certainty the merits of Admiral Schley's appeal. He tells us that five-sixths of that appeal—now, Mr. Chairman, mark the mathematical exactitude of that statement, that five-sixths of the appeal is based upon the demand to know who commanded and who is entitled to the credit for that victory. He immediately tells us what? I quote him:

What I have to decide therefore is whether or not President McKinley did injustice in the matter.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is unfair to Schley. Neither Admiral Schley nor his counsel nor any one of his friends and admirers or believers in his integrity or in the fairness or justice of his claim ever asked President Roosevelt or any other man to decide whether or not President McKinley had committed an injustice. Mr. Chairman, that gives the whole case away. It is hiding behind the ghostly shadow of a good man, and a desire to prevent the public from looking at the real situation.

Following that up, what does the President say? He gives the evidence of all the captains involved in that battle. After doing that he goes back again to his mathematics and demonstrates with the impetuosity of a school boy the actual number of shots which struck the Spanish ships, and, furthermore, demonstrates, to his satisfaction at least, the actual number of those shots fired by each respective American vessel.

Then what does he say? He reaches then the heat of the engagement with a coolness that is sublime, a coolness that is truly marvelous. He tells us, sitting in his cosy cabinet room, that he can plot and does plot with absolute certainty every single movement of the actual battle—a most wonderful capacity he has demonstrated in that line—and in doing so he reaches the conclusion (a most remarkable one, to me) that the battle itself was a "captain's fight." Involuntarily the mind travels back to that bright morning in the springtime when the great battle of San Juan hill was raging, and we, no doubt, believe, or are called upon to believe by parity of reasoning, that that battle was a colonel's or a lieutenant-colonel's victory.

No general had command there, by parity of reasoning. No one had command at the battle of Santiago, says the President; it was absolutely a captain's fight; yet immediately preceding that assertion he tells us that Admiral Sampson then in charge of the American squadron had left on that morning before the battle with a signal flying, observed by the entire squadron, "Disregard the movements of the commander in chief." Who is to disregard it? The squadron or the second in command? Who was the second in command? He admits here that Admiral Schley was the second in command. Is there any way to reconcile that faulty reasoning, telling us in one breath that the commander in chief had left with a signal flying, observed and acted upon by the entire squadron, to disregard the movements of the commander in chief, and then telling us that the battle immediately following, when that command devolved by right upon Admiral Schley, was won by the captains? What captains, in God's name?

I find from a careful reading of this judgment on this appeal that the principal captain selected by him for recommendation—at least the judgment in that appeal is in his favor—was Captain Wainwright, of the Gloucester, a torpedo boat, I think. The whole judgment is one in favor of every captain involved in that fight, except the actual commander of the battle, Admiral Schley; yet we find running through it some modicum of consolation. In plotting this actual battle, that he tells us he can do with absolute certainty, we find this (it is true it comes to the admiral in partnership with Captain Cook):

Admiral Schley is rightly entitled, as is Captain Cook, to the credit of what the Brooklyn did in the fight. On the whole she did well.

Thanks, mighty mogul, thanks. She did well, in his opinion. "On the whole she did well." It is true that she received more than a majority of the damage done to any of the American ships, but at least we have that modicum of consolation that Admiral Schley and Captain Cook together are entitled to credit for whatever the Brooklyn did, and that on the whole she did well. Mr. Chairman, it makes no difference to the public whether there was a retrograde movement or not; whether there was a blockade of 1 mile or 5 miles; whether or not there was a loop or no loop. The layman looks at the results. The people look at the crowning result, the grandest victory in naval warfare of modern times, and for that victory the people of this country are indebted to Admiral Schley.

I want to have read in my time by the Clerk a criticism taken from a newspaper, the Post of this city. I do not know the politics of that paper, nor do I care, but it is a great paper. I do not know whether it be Republican or Democratic, but I know its criticism of that judgment is so thoroughly stated, so thoroughly expressed, so thoroughly represents public opinion, that I desire to have it printed in the RECORD, and will send it to the desk to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RIGHT HERE WE DODGE.

"A high-school boy" writes to us in great anxiety of mind. He has carefully examined the President's memorandum in the Schley case, and, as boys will do at times, he asks embarrassing questions. He takes the very great, not to say irreverent, liberty of criticising the Presidential grammar and casting impious doubts upon his august rhetoric. This Smart Aleck—who will fall down before long unless he gets a better gait on—quotes from the memorandum, as follows:

"Under such circumstances it seems to me that the recommendations of President McKinley were eminently proper, and that so far as Admirals Sampson and Schley were concerned, it would have been unjust for him to have made other recommendations."

"Personally I feel that in view of Captain Clark's long voyage in the Oregon and the condition in which he brought her to the scene of service, as well as the way in which he actually managed her before and during the fight, it would have been well to have given him the same advancement that was given Wainwright."

And then our youthful correspondent proceeds, stiff-necked and unabashed, to say:

"Long before I got to the high school my teacher, Miss —, told me that it was ungrammatical to say such things as 'it would have been unjust for him to have made,' and 'it would have been well to have given,' and things like that. She said they didn't mean anything, that they were 'cancellations,' and left you in doubt as to the time or the meaning involved. It's a humiliating admission, but true, that whenever I used what she called 'the double potential,' she always kept me in or said mean things to me."

"Now, I can't believe Mr. Roosevelt would write bad grammar. He is a graduate of Harvard, and, besides, he writes books. I have read his history of the great war in Cuba, and it was just fine. I only wish I had been old enough to go with the Rough Riders and charge heights and slaughter Spaniards as they did. Still, I can not forget how Miss — used to rap me when I was a little second-year chap and said things like 'it would have been well to have given him.' I wish you would tell me about it. I don't know whether to believe the President or the grammar."

We respectfully but swiftly dodge this complication. In any issue, as between the President of the United States and a mere private citizen like Mr. Lindley Murray, there is only one attitude the patriotic and loyal American can conscientiously assume. We may not know what "it would have been well to have given him" means. But shall we set up against a carefully prepared declaration by Mr. Roosevelt the benighted challenge of our own ignorance? Never! A thousand times never! To use the language of our own Mrs. Malaprop, we might say to this high-school boy, "strictly nous avons"—that we do not take kindly to "it would have been unjust for him to have made." Secretly we assign that phrase to Du Maurier's list of "things one would rather have put otherwise." Speaking officially, we say: "Mum's the word."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Chairman, in closing, I desire to direct the attention of the public to the parallel between the two historic cases in this country. There appears to me to be a remarkable parallel between this present case of Admiral Schley and the grave injustice done to a great Union soldier in the civil war, Gen. Fitz-John Porter, who for more than thirty years rested under the stigma of cowardice and of treason. At last he was vindicated.

The great Gen. U. S. Grant, who had hastily acted in the first instance, subsequently upon a review of the testimony in the case, with a manly courage truly American, undid that injustice, and to-day the name of Fitz-John Porter shines brightly in the grand galaxy of generals who fought in the Union Army. I hope and trust that Admiral Schley will not have so long to wait. I hope and trust that the President may find occasion to reverse this most hideous, monstrously hideous, judgment in his case, and if he fails to do so, mark this prophecy, it will be but a short time when this House, under a different majority and under the control of a different party, will see that ample and perfect justice is done to this great, this noble, this patriotic man, this gallant sailor, Admiral Schley. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have leave to print.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have leave to print. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. I supposed they had had leave to print; they have been given ample time.

Mr. SULZER. This request is only for those who have spoken on the bill.

Mr. HULL. I understand, but they have all spoken themselves out, and I object to their going to work and writing up a lot more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. SULZER. I trust that the gentleman from Iowa will now consume some of his time.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Iowa will be glad to proceed with the reading of the bill, if the gentleman has no objection. I make the request that we proceed with the reading of the bill, with the understanding that to-morrow morning the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], a member of the committee, have twenty-five minutes, and that we have twenty-five minutes on this side, if we desire to take it.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to that, and I trust now, as I have agreed to that proposition, the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his objection to unanimous consent that those who have spoken have leave to extend their remarks.

Mr. HULL. I make that request in order to accommodate gentlemen on the other side of the House, not with any idea of accommodating myself; so that in place of its being a concession for the gentleman to agree with me it is a concession on our part to ask that consent for them, and I can see no reason for withdrawing my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], who is a member of the committee, understands, I think, that he will be given some time, and he is now preparing some remarks on this bill. He is not present, and I desire to have him protected, and that time be given to him.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's request would not affect him at all. It would not help him out any, because the request was for those who have spoken, and they have all had time and have finished their remarks, with the exception, as I remember now, of one or two gentlemen, who asked that they might be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD, which consent was given. A general leave to print to those who have spoken would mean that parties can go to work and write anything they please, and I think it is hardly a fair proposition.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I misunderstood the request.

Mr. HULL. But if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] under the five-minute rule to-morrow will ask leave to extend his remarks I shall be glad to state that I hope the leave will be given him.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] addressed the House yesterday and requested me to ask leave for him to extend his remarks.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, we gave Mr. GAINES some of our time yesterday in order to allow him to finish and he talked out. I should hate to give him permission to get a second wind and go on with it. I shall object.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the reading of the bill be proceeded with now, under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. No one demanding the floor, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. HAY. I should like to know whether the request was granted that I have leave to speak to-morrow?

Mr. HULL. I understand that consent was given on the proposition that I asked for the gentleman from Virginia, that he have twenty-five minutes to-morrow, and that we on this side have twenty-five minutes, if we desire.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that there may be no doubt about it, if there be no objection the request of the gentleman from Iowa will be granted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, $11,500,000.

Mr. HAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 17, page 4, strike out the words "eleven million five hundred" and insert "nine million nine hundred and fifty."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, when the Army was increased to 100,000 men it was understood that as soon as the exigencies of the service and of the Government allowed it would be reduced. This bill calls for an Army of 83,000 men—5,000 Filipino scouts and 78,000 American troops.

We have the evidence of Governor Taft that there will only be required in the Philippine Islands for the next year about 20,000 American soldiers. This bill provides beyond that for 5,000 Filipino scouts, making 25,000 men for the Philippine Islands.

The artillery has now been increased to 18,000 men, which is considered to be sufficient for the manning of our coast defenses and for the field batteries. So that if you take the 25,000 men for the Philippines and the 18,000 for the artillery from the 83,000 provided in this bill you will leave about 40,000 men in this country, outside of the 18,000 used in the artillery. I should like to know how these 40,000 men can be used in this country at the various posts which we have? It is a well-known fact that the posts have been decreased, and that there is no need for as many men outside of the artillery as there used to be. Before the war with Spain 25,000 men were sufficient for every purpose in the United States.

It is now proposed to keep 40,000 men here. The amendment which I present is offered upon the basis of reducing this bill by 15,000 men, so that there will be 30,000 men here and 25,000 men in the Philippine Islands, an ample number, more than sufficient. But I desire to be conservative, and I desire that the Government shall have all the men necessary to protect its interests in the Philippine Islands and here. The only use really for that number of men (30,000) in this country is to have a sufficient number of them to interchange with the troops in the Philippines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very true that it is difficult to ascertain just exactly how many men are needed there. The Secretary of War says in his hearings that we will need 30,000 regular troops and 5,000 Filipino scouts. Governor Taft, as I said a moment ago, stated they would only need 20,000 in all, and that they ought to be reduced, and that they could use what he called the Filipino constabulary there to much better advantage than they could use troops. General Hughes says practically the same thing. General Otis, in his hearings before the Philippine Committee of the Senate, says that they only need 25,000 troops in the Philippine Islands.

Now, what I want to know is, why we should vote an Army of 83,000 men, when we can get along without any trouble with an Army of 66,000 men? If gentlemen can show that we need more than 66,000 men, if there is any necessity for it, then I am willing to vote it. But after a careful consideration of the subject, after reviewing all the evidence which I have been able to get with regard to the Army and the needs of the Army in the Philippines and in this country, I have come to the conclusion that we can without trouble reduce the Army about 15,000 men in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Now, then, the amendment which I have offered is based, as I have said, upon the reduction of the Army by 15,000 men from this bill. We all know that there is no need, and there will be no need, in the year 1903, for any troops in Cuba. This bill provides for two battalions, I believe, in Porto Rico; and if there is any necessity, if the conditions in the Philippines are such as to need any more men than the 30,000 men as asked for by the Secretary of War, then I would like to know it. We derive our information from Administration sources, we derive it from the civil governor of the Philippine Islands, we derive it from the officers of the United States Army, so far as they are permitted to speak.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that there is a sort of tyranny of silence which is placed upon the Army; that officers are not permitted to give their opinions to committees of either House of Congress without being called to account for it by people in high place and in power. We know that the Commanding General of the Army of the United States, for giving his opinion upon the verdict of a court of inquiry in another branch of the service, was reprimanded by the President publicly before a promiscuous audience. I say, therefore, that if they have any evidence to show that there are more men needed in the Philippines than they themselves say there are, let that evidence be produced. But until it is produced it is our business as members of this House, legislating for the American people and for the American taxpayers, to keep this army down to such a number as is necessary, and not to give a single man more than is necessary. I propose to follow the present amendment with amendments all along through the bill, reducing it as I have said.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think this side of the House should be under the greatest obligation to the gentleman from Virginia for his solicitude in keeping the appropriations of this Congress down to the lowest limit, and I should be glad to join with him in that policy, that we might make the total appropriations showing a very great deal of reduction under Republican leadership; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs has already reduced the estimate for the Army proper by $1,000,000 from that submitted to us in the estimate. So that this amount that we have reported to the House is for a much smaller army than was originally estimated for when the estimates were submitted to Congress in last December.

Mr. HAY. I will ask the gentleman the question whether or not those estimates were made for an army of 100,000 men?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; not quite.

Mr. HAY. Well, what does the gentleman estimate the Army to be raised under this bill?

Mr. HULL. The Army under this bill is, as I understand, between seventy and eighty thousand men. But I want to take issue with the gentleman's argument as to the number of men we may need in the Philippine Islands. I believe if we were to reduce them below the point of safety it would encourage further insurrection and result in increased expenditures on the part of the Government in the future.

When I was in the Philippine Islands I had the privilege of going with General Chaffee and visiting nearly all the posts outside the island of Luzon, and the evidence taken before General Chaffee, not given by Army officers alone, but given by the native officials, the governors, the fiscals, the treasurers, and the supervisors, was, without exception, that it was unsafe to take any troops from the localities we visited. There is to-day no organized army in the Philippines, but there is lawlessness all over the islands.

I know that Governor Taft has been very optimistic and hopeful as to the conditions that may prevail in the Philippine Islands. I sincerely hope time may prove him right. I think conditions are better than when I was there, but he was very optimistic when I was there as to the military force it would require to protect life and property. After I left there I think you will all remember that several of the provinces were turned back to military authority on account of the civil governments being prematurely started on their careers. They were powerless to accomplish good.

This appropriation offered by the committee—I supposed it met the approval of the entire committee, because we had very full conference as to all of these appropriations, and I will say for the credit of my Democratic friends that they joined with the majority in cutting down wherever they could; but when we made the report it was on the basis of a reduction of the army in the Philippines to about 30,000 men, American soldiers, and 5,000 Filipino soldiers organized under the law that was passed when we adopted the general reorganization bill.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is a great mistake for this committee to reduce this amount below what was reported from the committee. The Administration in the United States and Governor Taft in the Philippines are both of them anxious to reduce the army to the lowest point consistent with safety and the interest of the United States, and if we do not need the number that we appropriate for, which, in my judgment, is the lowest number that this country can safely go ahead with, they will not be used, and if not enlisted and employed they will not be paid for; but we should not make it impossible to pay if enlisted.

The gentleman from Virginia is not more anxious to get the army down to the lowest point consistent with safety than is the Administration, both the President and the War Department, so I hope the amendment will not be adopted; and I can see no good reason why he should have offered it.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman says he wants to reduce the Army to what he considers a point of safety?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. HAY. How many men do you think ought to be kept in the Philippines?

Mr. HULL. I think that there ought to be more than the Secretary of War estimates, if you want my honest judgment. They have five hundred and some odd posts there. The force of natives there is new and untrained, and it is only effective when it knows that it is backed by the power of the United States. Without that power the native troops would be worthless.

Mr. HAY. Then that is from your experience?

Mr. HULL. From my personal experience and what I have read and know of it, I should say 30,000 American troops in the Philippines was reducing the Army to the lowest point consistent with safety, and reducing the number more than I would take the responsibility of doing.

Mr. HAY. That is what the Secretary of War says.

Mr. HULL. Yes; but I think it is too low. I think you ought to have more than 30,000 there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks that the gentleman from Iowa may continue for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL. Now, let me finish my answer. If it takes 30,000 troops in the Philippines, there ought to be 30,000 here, because these troops ought to be exchanged at stated intervals so that no one would be there more than two years if possible. If you do that and have 18,000 artillerymen—and I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say the artillery was raised to that number, although I didn't so understand it—that would be 78,000 men.

Mr. HAY. And 5,000 Filipino troops.

Mr. HULL. If you have that number, the amount we have reported here will, in my judgment, call for a deficiency bill during the short session of this Congress. We are appropriating for 50,000 privates; and we cut off $1,000,000 from the estimates. The estimates were for 55,000 privates.

Mr. JETT. From the gentleman's judgment and experience while in the Philippines, does he or does he not believe that it will be necessary for some time to keep troops where the so-called civil government has been established?

Mr. HULL. I say yes. It will be necessary for some time. I do not regard it as possible that a people who have never had any experience in civilized government, as we understand it, can in the course of a year or two years or three years leap into full-fledged American citizenship, with fully developed ideas of the rights of property and life and a full comprehension of how to administer a free government.

Mr. HAY. Governor Taft in his evidence before the Philippine Committee stated that the constabulary there were doing more good than the soldiers; that they could find these robbers and these disturbers of the peace much more effectively than the soldiers could.

Mr. HULL. I think that is true in one sense and not true in another. I think that if the United States troops should be removed the local constabulary would not amount to anything, but when backed by American troops and protected by them they are better scouts than our soldiers, because they are more familiar with the habits and haunts of their people.

Mr. HAY. I am not advocating the removal of the American troops, but I wanted to know the lowest number of American troops added to the Filipino troops that the gentleman thought necessary.

Mr. HULL. I should say that 35,000 would be better than 30,000.

Mr. HAY. Then the gentleman thinks that 35,000 American troops, in addition to the 5,000 Filipino troops, are needed there?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir; and if I had adhered to my own idea I should have insisted upon that number; but I yielded to the judgment of the Secretary of War, who thought that 30,000 of our troops, with the 5,000 Filipino troops, would suffice.

Mr. HAY. And you think they will be needed there for some years to come?

Mr. HULL. For the next fiscal year, anyhow; and that is what we are legislating for.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. My recollection is that Governor Taft, before the Insular Affairs Committee, said that all the provinces of the archipelago were pacified, with the possible exception of five.

Mr. HULL. I have not read what Governor Taft said, and I do not want to answer for him. They may be pacified in one sense of the term; that is, there may be no organized army there.

Allow me to say that I have been so busy at home for the last month or five weeks trying to preserve my own private or political interests that I have paid but little attention to public matters, and I think I will take this occasion to say in reply to what has been thrown out here to-day that while I was thus engaged at home I made absolutely no promises as to what should be my course in the future. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Iowa thinks that is an answer to my question, I suppose I must be satisfied with it.

Mr. HULL. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman's question.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. What I wanted to ask was this—the gentleman did not wait till I finished my question: I stated that, according to my recollection, Governor Taft, before the Insular Affairs Committee, testified that the whole Philippine Archipelago is pacified, with the possible exception of four or five provinces. Now, I understand the gentleman from Iowa has visited that archipelago, and I would like to know whether he agrees with Judge Taft on that point.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have partially answered that question already. I do not believe that pacification exists in the broad sense that there is a law-abiding people. If by pacification is meant simply that there is no organized, armed rebellion against the authorities, I should say yes. But I want to say from my observation that there is a large lawless element there that never has been controlled by any government in the past; this is the first Government that ever has undertaken to control it and establish peaceful conditions outside of the large cities.

And it is going to require the strong arm of the Government to protect the Filipinos from their own people—not to protect the United States in the cities, but to protect the law-abiding Filipinos, who want to work and make a living, from the raids of those robber bands that for centuries have preyed upon them, destroying the fruits of their industry and compelling them to huddle in little towns along the seaports, instead of spreading themselves out on farms in the interior as they might have otherwise done.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is referring to the Filipinos who oppose the authority of our Government?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; they oppose any government. They oppose us just now because we are the government; but they would oppose any government. They would oppose their own government. They are lawless bands of ladrones.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it necessary to have a standing army there to keep those provinces pacified?

Mr. HULL. The future must determine that.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion about it.

Mr. HULL. I say for the present, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HULL. I call for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] a question, and for that purpose I ask that his time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman for two minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Iowa to state that if we had 30,000 Americans in the Philippines, or 35,000, which he thought would be better, we ought to have the same number of troops here, in order that these soldiers could be exchanged or replaced from the United States to the Philippines as often as at least once every two years. I would like to know the reasons for the necessity of that change. Is it owing to the climatic conditions there?

Mr. HULL. It is a tropical country, and no people that are engaged in service there ought to be kept any great length of time. While a large number of the troops there when mustered out were perfectly healthy, and the percentage of sickness in the past was no higher than it is here, yet the danger of affecting the constitution of Americans by keeping them there in service too long is enough of itself to warrant the change, and we change troops in this country from one part of it to another in the same way. We do not keep troops in the Gulf States an unreasonable time.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Well, the main reason for that change then would be owing to the health of the soldiers in the Philippines?

Mr. HULL. I should say, yes; very largely that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word in conclusion. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say that there were only 50,000 enlisted men provided for in this bill.

Mr. HULL. I said there are less than 55,000. The estimates were for 55,000 previously, and we cut it down $1,000,000.

Mr. HAY. And yet it is very well understood that there is to be an Army of 83,000 men under this bill. Now, I understand that the artillery has 18,000 men. Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. HULL. I do not so understand.

Mr. HAY. The artillery, I say, is to have 18,000 men in it.

Mr. HULL. I doubt if there are that many there now, but they are getting it to that number as rapidly as they can find good men.

Mr. HAY. That is what this appropriation calls for.

Mr. HULL. Yes; but you must remember in addition to this statement that this appropriation does not commence until after the 30th of next June.

Mr. HAY. Oh, I understand that, of course; and it is all the more reason for reducing the appropriation, because as time goes on, as Governor Taft says, so much less there is any necessity for American soldiers in the Philippine Islands. Now, there certainly can not be any reason for 43,000 soldiers in this country, 18,000 soldiers in the artillery and 25,000 outside.

Surely no man will contend that it is necessary to have that number of troops here, and if there is a chance of an opportunity to reduce this Army, as these gentlemen who come from the Philippines tell us that there is, then we ought to reduce it, and next December, if it is found necessary that a larger appropriation shall be made, we will be here to make it. Therefore I say that it is our duty to the taxpayers and as representatives of the American people to bring this Army down, and to reduce this appropriation as much as we possibly can, and I hope that gentlemen upon this floor who have the interests of the people at heart will vote for the amendment which I have introduced.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield just a minute, I have what purports to be an interview from Governor Taft when he landed in San Francisco on January 22, and I will read the language with which he is credited:

Fifteen thousand men will be an ample force in the islands before the close of the year. I was told this only a few days before I came away. Officers thoroughly versed in the situation gave me the figures.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (called for by Mr. HAY) there were—ayes 31, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay for length of service for all enlisted men, exclusive of Hospital Corps, $900,492.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is to me a matter of amazement that the recklessness of assertion which at the beginning of the controversy about the Philippine Islands characterized this discussion should still continue on this floor. Even earlier in the discussion, before gentlemen had time to inform themselves, this was inexcusable. At this late date it is unpardonable. The gentleman from Iowa would have you believe that the Philippine Islands never had in the interior a good municipal government. Where does he get that information? Not from any history or other authentic source. The fact is that the Philippine Islands—that is, the Christian islands—prior to the war with Spain, had good municipal governments.

Every writer who has ever discussed the subject, including distinguished Frenchmen and distinguished Englishmen, and our own Dean Worcester, of the Michigan University, bear testimony to the peaceableness, honesty, and good social qualities of the Filipino people. When, after the cessation of hostilities at the end of our war with Spain, two Americans, one a military and the other a naval officer of the United States, visited every part of the Christian island of Luzon, upon their return, they said that ere the embers of the war with Spain had disappeared the people had returned to their fields and shops and resumed the pursuits of peace, and that the island was as peaceable as any part of the United States.

A report to this effect was made to their superiors and has been printed as a public document. Why do gentlemen refuse to inform themselves on the subject and in the face of all history continue to misrepresent the real situation in the Philippines?

Why do they seek to misrepresent the facts and pervert history? Gentlemen, the truth will finally be known. In discussing the question it is useless to try to exclude it. The people will finally know all the facts.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] says that no less than 35,000 troops should be retained in the islands, and in this connection he and others who discuss it talk about the pacification of the country. What do you mean by pacification?

Do you think the time will ever come when a conquered country, inhabited by four or five millions of civilized Christians, will be content to live under alien rule? Do you think that there will ever be found on earth a country such as I have described, where anything short of brute force will secure submission to a conqueror? Instead of the word "pacify" say terrorize. Other conquered countries have been pacified, you will say. Ah, yes! Ireland has been pacified, but at the end of seven centuries of foreign occupation we find 35,000 British troops there, and a tax imposed to prohibit men from having firearms in their houses. Seven centuries of pacification, and yet the people of Ireland are as ready as they were in the days of Elizabeth to seize arms and fight for the liberties of their country.

India has been pacified, but the bayonet of the conqueror is at India's throat. Poland has been pacified, yet the largest contingent of the armies of the Czar stationed in any one portion of his Empire, from the day of the tragedy of the destruction of that kingdom down to this hour, have been within striking distance of Polish centers of population. And so I might go on.

The truth is that God has planted in the breasts of men the national instinct, the pride of race, the love of country, which everywhere leads them to resist the aggression of any foreign power that invades their country and usurps its government.

If we are to retain the Philippine Islands as a vassal state in perpetuity, if we are to set up a colonial government there and maintain it, we must enter this new field prepared to follow the example of England and other great colonizing powers. We must maintain a large army there and the taxpayers must foot the bills. We must rule by force. There will be opposition. We must beat it down. So, when hereafter we speak of peace in the Philippine Islands, let us say not that the people over there are "pacified," but that they have been terrorized into submission. That is what conquest means.

Do you want to do that? Will the American people continue to abet you in doing it? Are you content to look into the future with the distinct understanding that fifteen, thirty-five, or fifty thousand, or any other number of thousands of troops shall be kept there at the expense of the American taxpayers for the purpose of coercing consent to our sovereignty? If we are to go on in this way I do not believe an army of 35,000 will be any too large. The Spaniards went there when these people were barbarians. The islanders had no civilized government.

The Spaniards imported a large number of Catholic priests—the Catholic religion then being practically the only Christian denomination in existence—and converted substantially all the people of the arable portions of the northern islands to the Christian religion. From that day on Spanish was the official language. The Spaniards were the tutors of the Filipinos. They furnished them their priests and their religion and their learning and their schools. The people became civilized under Spanish rule. Inter-marriages of Spaniards and natives produced the educated and enlightened classes which have had most to do with making Philippine history.

Identity of official language, identity of religion, as well as many humane and beneficent projects carried forward in the earlier days of the settlement of the islands, bound the Filipinos to the Spanish Crown. But as the natives learned what was going on in the outside world, as the spirit of individual self-respect asserted itself in their breasts, the national spirit, which, thank God, abides everywhere, came to them also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Repeatedly and repeatedly they rebelled against this alien rule. Revolt after revolt occurred, and for many years before their final expulsion the Spaniards were compelled to keep in the islands an army which frequently exceeded 50,000 men in order to hold sovereignty over that people.

We must do the same thing. Do not tell me that 15,000 troops will quell opposition to American rule. The time will come when 100,000 men will be needed. Withdraw 15,000 men now—cut your force down to the beggarly 15,000 talked about—and you will find that 100,000 will be needed before you are through with it. Every day you stay there will embitter them. Every hour of their travail will intensify their desire for independence and liberty.

Mr. PARKER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it will take a hundred thousand men?

Mr. COCHRAN. I say if you cut your army down and another insurrection takes place you will have to send a hundred thousand men there to quell it.

Mr. PARKER. Did you vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia to cut down the Army?

Mr. COCHRAN. I will vote to withdraw 1 soldier, 5 soldiers, 5,000 soldiers, 15,000 soldiers, or all our soldiers from the Philippines every time I get a chance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PARKER. Then you want—

Mr. COCHRAN. I want every nation on the earth to enjoy the God-given right of independence of every other nation on earth.

Mr. PARKER. I understood the gentleman to say that if the army were reduced there would be a massacre there. Do I understand—

Mr. COCHRAN. You did not understand the gentleman to say any such thing, if you were listening, and if you were not listening, you ought not to put words into my mouth which I have not uttered. I said the withdrawal of 15,000 troops would be followed by another insurrection. That is what I said. I believe that at every opportunity the people of the islands will arise and attempt to win independence.

Mr. PARKER. Does not the gentleman know from what we saw here the other day about these telegraphers it was pretty near the same thing?

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know what the gentleman refers to? I know this, that in every war such as we are carrying on in the Philippine Islands all the usages of civilized warfare are forgotten by both parties to the contention. Under such circumstances the struggle ceases to be legitimate war and degenerates into bloody reprisals levied generally by both parties to the conflict without reference to the usages of war.

I was going on to say that no matter what you may do, insubordination, resistance, rebellion will continue. No people numbering millions will ever peaceably and willingly submit to the reign of a conqueror.

Under such circumstances resistance is mere obedience to impulses and sentiments which shape the conduct and destiny of all races. A people speaking the same language, inspired by the same ideals, segregated from others, and possessing the country in which they live, instinctively desire a government of their own—a monarchy if they be monarchists—a republic if they are democrats.

Do you regret that this is true, you gentlemen who favor the conquest of the Philippines? Whether you do or not is immaterial. It is a principle of humanity as ineradicable as any emotion of the human breast. No country that enters upon the career of a conqueror can escape dealing with it. Force, not reason, will compel obedience to government that is despised. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Inspector-General's Department: For pay of officers in the Inspector-General's Department, $51,500.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to pour a little sugar on the troubled waters. I send to the Clerk's desk an article from the Philadelphia North American, a great Republican newspaper, which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Philadelphia North American, March 14, 1902.]

Representative SULZER introduces a bill which is intended to reform the present tariff law. Aims a blow at trusts.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that that has nothing to do with the bill. We are not dealing with the tariff under the five-minute rule. We are dealing with the Army, and there is no use taking up the time in this way.

Mr. SULZER. The point of order, in my judgment, can not be made until the gentleman from Iowa finds out what this article is about.

Mr. HULL. Well, the way it starts out is enough to find out. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk has read far enough to indicate the character of the article; and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I will read the article myself. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I introduced a bill in this House some time ago to repeal that provision in the Dingley tariff law known as the color restriction on sugar.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I raise the point on the gentleman himself. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill, and under the rules he had plenty of time in general debate to discuss the matter that he is now referring to.

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor, and the gentleman from Iowa is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. The Chair does not know what my amendment is going to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moved to strike out the last word of this paragraph, and the remarks of the gentleman are not addressed to that amendment, and he is not in order.

Mr. SULZER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss this matter, and I trust the gentleman will not make that point of order. He will get along much more rapidly if he does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to discuss the question he is now discussing?

Mr. SULZER. I understand I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor, unless he is in order.

Mr. SULZER. Then I ask unanimous consent—

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed without being interrupted with points of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to proceed without being interrupted by points of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I object to that. I am willing to concede to the gentleman, as he had no opportunity, controlling the time himself, and his modesty forbade him to use it, that he may have five minutes to discuss the tariff question if he desires. I will not object to that kind of a proposition if he or his friends will put it in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent—

Mr. HULL. I do not ask it, but if the other side asks unanimous consent I will not raise any objection.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa to object to the reading of this article from the Philadelphia North American?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order. The point of order has been raised against the reading of that article, and the Chair has sustained the point of order. Does the gentleman request unanimous consent. If so, the Chair will submit the request to the committee.

Mr. SULZER. I understood unanimous consent had been given.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent has not been given.

Mr. SULZER. Then I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to present this matter to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discuss the question that he is now discussing for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DICK. I object.

Mr. HAY. Too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. SULZER. The President will read him another lecture to-morrow morning. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The Corps of Engineers: For pay of officers in the Corps of Engineers, $331,900.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were—21 ayes and 53 noes.

Mr. SULZER. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three members present—a quorum.

Mr. SULZER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HULL and Mr. SULZER were appointed as tellers.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported—22 ayes and 63 noes.

Mr. SULZER. No quorum present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just counted a quorum. The point is dilatory, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional pay to such officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, $425,000: Provided, That hereafter there shall not be allowed or paid any increase of longevity pay to any officer retired from active service above the sum allowed and paid to such officer at the date of retirement.

In all, $2,068,301.07.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this changes existing law.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Ohio withhold the point of order, so that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], a member of the committee, can be heard?

Mr. WARNOCK. I will reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio this morning discussed the subject of longevity pay. The committee have placed this provision in the bill with the desire to bring before this House an evil that has been presented to them for several years past. The Paymaster-General in his reports and the Paymaster-General in the hearings before the committee every time has recommended that something be done to cure an obvious defect in the present law, and that is this: Officers when they have been placed upon the retired list for any cause receive three-quarters of full pay under all circumstances. There is no disposition to cut that down. But under the law as it now stands, as construed by the Supreme Court, the longer a man remains on the retired list the more pay he gets under the longevity clause, and for this reason: Longevity pay is given for length of service. For every term of five years of service an additional 10 per cent of pay is given—

Mr. WARNOCK. Does not that stop at the end of twenty years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I was just going to say it is given for four periods, or up to twenty years, when the officer shall have received 40 per cent additional pay. Now, under the law as it exists at present we have found quite a number of cases where the officer has been retired after a few years of service, and after that go on the retired list with three-quarters pay, to do whatever they may choose. The longevity pay increases right along. After five years they get 10 per cent more pay; after ten years they get 20 per cent more pay; after fifteen years they get 30 per cent more pay, and after twenty years they get 40 per cent additional pay; and so the longer they remain on the retired list the more pay they get.

The committee conceive that that was not the theory of longevity pay. The history of this statute shows that when it was first enacted the pay department construed that longevity pay was not applied to the retired list. That construction was maintained for quite a number of years, until the Supreme Court of the United States construed the word "service" as applying to the retired list as well as to the active list, so the longevity pay applied to the officers on the retired list. Now, the theory of longevity pay is that the longer a man is in active service in the Army the better fitted he is by his experience and his wisdom to perform efficient service for the Government, and Congress has deemed it necessary to retain the services of such men and prevent their resignation when most needed by giving them this additional longevity pay.

But when a man is on the retired list, when under the law he is not required, with few exceptions, to perform any services whatever, the reason for the addition of this longevity pay does not apply. Longevity is a gratuity alone. It is not a pay called for by rank; it is a pay that is given for service, pay given for wisdom, a pay given for experience, and these reasons do not obtain in the case of the man on the retired list of the Army. Now, these officers on the retired list are getting pretty good pay anyway. I have a list of the rates of pay that is given to the officers on the retired list, as shown by the very last Army Register of 1901.

The highest pay is given to the Lieutenant-General—$8,250 per annum. This is the pay on the retired list. The lowest pay is given to a second lieutenant, who may be retired the very moment after he receives his commission, and yet he receives $1,050 per annum. Now, that second lieutenant, after he has received his commission and goes on the retired list, may, after remaining on the retired list twenty years, receive 40 per cent additional pay, or $1,450 per annum, although he does not do a single thing for the Government. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK] made this morning a very eloquent and able speech recounting the services and the sacrifices of many gallant officers during the civil war. This amendment applies to only a few of those men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. I ask that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] be allowed five minutes more. This is a matter vitally affecting the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Minnesota be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Before the gentleman from Minnesota resumes, I wish to call his attention to an amendment which I have submitted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK]. That gentleman, if this provision be accepted, is perfectly willing to withdraw his point of order. I would like to have the gentleman from Minnesota address his remarks to it.

I understand that the objection to the provision in the bill is founded principally upon the injustice which it is understood would accrue under it to those officers who have been receiving this longevity pay, and who now in their old age may find it stricken off under the operation of this provision. I have suggested to the gentleman from Ohio to insert in line 4 the word "hereafter;" so that the clause will read:

That hereafter there shall not be allowed or paid any increase of longevity pay to any officer hereafter retired.

Mr. JETT. Let me say to my friend that that already appears in the bill. The language of the bill is:

Provided, That hereafter there shall not be allowed, etc.

Mr. HILL. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK] will withdraw his amendment if my amendment be substituted for the provision of the bill.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has a better amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The point suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Ohio has been considered. The alternative propositions are the one inserted in the bill and the amendment which I send up now to be read for information, and which I think covers exactly the point suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

The Clerk read as follows:

On and after the approval of this act no further increase of longevity pay shall accrue to officers now on the retired list, and officers hereafter retired from active service shall not be allowed or paid any increase of longevity pay above the sum allowed and paid to such officers at the date of retirement.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This amendment will not affect such officers as those described by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK] this morning—those who, having served during the war of the rebellion, have been placed on the retired list and have been there long enough to get their full longevity pay. They will continue to get it if this amendment be adopted. Nor does the amendment affect those who have served in the Regular Army long enough to receive their full longevity pay before going on the retired list. All those will be exempted from the operation of this amendment. It will cover a few officers who have entered the service late in life, as chaplains, quartermasters, paymasters, etc., and who have served only a few years before going on the retired list. This proposition will prevent such officers from getting larger pay after going upon the retired list than they did before.

Mr. WARNOCK. The amendment sounds all right, but I would like to see it in writing before giving my assent to it. If it does not affect the old officers who were retired immediately upon the close of the civil war on account of wounds or disability, that is all I want.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The officers of the War Department whom I have consulted about the matter tell me that the provision will not affect any officer who served—

Mr. HULL. It does not affect any officer who has already been receiving full pay upon the retired list.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It does not cut anybody down. It simply prevents the pay of certain officers from increasing under the longevity provision. The effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to prevent any further increase of longevity pay to those who go on the retired list hereafter. The amendment affects only a comparatively few officers. A table has been prepared by the War Department showing the number who would be affected—only 13 officers of five years' service, 62 over five years, and 78 over fifteen years, so that there would be less than 10 per cent of the officers on the retired list affected by the amendment as first suggested, and none of those covered by the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNOCK. If that amendment is adopted, I am entirely content to withdraw my point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. HULL. Just offer that as an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That this amendment I send to the desk be offered as a substitute for the proviso at the top of page 11.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WARNOCK. I say that if that amendment be adopted I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, so that the gentleman can maintain his right, that the amendment which I have sent to the desk, and which has been read, be substituted instead of the proviso on the top of page 11.

Mr. HULL. I understand the gentleman asks to strike out all after the word "provided" down to and including the word "retired" in the fifth line, and insert this as that proviso.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. That simply makes a little more definite what you mean by the proviso already in there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it makes it definite, but it does not include those now on the retired list. It does not cut down anybody.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to cutting down anybody.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, we have not, but we can not do it under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his point of order, but only on the ground that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. HULL. He reserves his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the amendment which he sends to the desk be substituted instead of the proviso on the top of page 11. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. I object.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. SULZER. Then I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the Chair will rule on the point of order, then I will offer this as an amendment.

Mr. SULZER. Regular order.

Mr. HULL. Regular order is the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the amendment that the proviso on page 11, "Provided, That hereafter there shall not be allowed," etc.—

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, I offer this as an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled yet.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I beg the Chair's pardon; I thought he had.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman from New York the ground upon which he bases his point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Does the Chair desire to hear me on this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman to state the ground upon which he makes the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Is the Chair in doubt?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please reply to the question of the Chair?

Mr. SULZER. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is in doubt, I desire to say that my point of order is that the proposed amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the point of order—

Mr. CAPRON. Before the Chair rules, may I be heard upon the point of order for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not in doubt. The Chair holds that the point of order made by the gentleman from New York is well taken and that it changes existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, I offer the amendment which I forward to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars," line 2, page 11, the following: "Provided, That on and after the approval of this act no further increase of longevity pay shall accrue to officers now on the retired list, and officers hereafter retired from active service shall not be allowed or paid any increase of longevity pay above the sum allowed and paid to such officers at the time of retirement."

Mr. SULZER. I make a point of order against that.

Mr. HULL. I am inclined to think the point of order is not well taken, Mr. Chairman. This is a limitation under the appropriation only. The other was more than a limitation, because it reduced the pay of officers. This does not reduce the pay, and my impression is that the gentleman had better look up the law on that. This is an effort toward a limitation upon an appropriation bill to declare what shall be paid. The gentleman puts himself on record as in favor of giving increased pay to men year after year who perform no service for the Government. The gentleman may want to go before the country on that theory, and I am delighted to have him do it.

Mr. SULZER. Then you are dissatisfied with the bill you reported to the House.

Mr. HULL. I do not understand the gentleman's remark.

Mr. SULZER. Why did you vote for the bill in the committee?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I voted for it because I believed the other provision ought to have been agreed to. That is why I did it.

Mr. SULZER. Then you ought not to have done it.

Mr. HULL. I would have supported the bill as reported if you had not stopped it on a point of order. It was the gentleman from New York who interfered with it. By his point he places himself and his party on record as in favor of increasing pay of officers when they perform no service for the country. But I do not believe his point of order is well taken as to this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is as follows:

Provided, That on and after the approval of this act—

And so forth. It is evident that the words "that on and after the approval of this act," if the provision was adopted, would result in enacting permanent law in this appropriation bill, and for that reason are subject to the point of order. If the provision read so as to limit the appropriations in this bill, it would not be subject to the point of order; but this provision seeks to enact permanent law, and consequently the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which I think comes clearly within the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the following, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "dollars," in line 2, page 11, the following: "Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for the payment of further increase of longevity pay to officers now on the retired list; and officers hereafter retired from active service shall not be allowed or paid therefrom any increase of longevity pay above the sum allowed and paid to such officers at the date of retirement."

Mr. SULZER. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. That is just the same as the other. It means the same thing and would accomplish the same thing. It is just a change of verbiage. I ask for order, Mr. Chairman. I think the Chair is capable of deciding the point of order without instructions from the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will be in order. If the gentleman has anything to say upon the point of order, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly subject to a point of order. It is exactly the same in effect as the previous amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and accomplishes the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the amendment now proposed is a limitation upon the appropriations in this bill, and with that in view, if the gentleman has anything to say, the Chair will be glad to hear from him.

Mr. SULZER. My point of order is that this amendment will change existing law, and is clearly subject to the point of order under the rule, and the Chair has held accordingly regarding two previous amendments. This amendment is almost identical with the others, and accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, just a word before the Chair decides the point of order, and one word only, I think, will make the Chair very clear on the subject. That is, that I am delighted that at last the Democratic party has appeared as champion of the retired list, and in favor of increasing pay of officers after they are placed on the retired list.

Mr. SULZER. That comes with very bad grace from a Republican who has been in favor of it ever since he has been in Congress.

Mr. HULL. You gentlemen have always opposed it before.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. JETT. I desire to be heard on the point of order. I want to take exception to what my distinguished friend [Mr. HULL], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has said.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear that question discussed. Unless the gentleman has something to say on the point of order—

Mr. JETT. I was going to say that I hope the Chairman can see his way clear to hold that this is a mere limitation upon this appropriation, and that this amendment may be adopted. For myself I would love to have seen it stand as reported in this bill rather than see this provision enacted into law, and I hope the distinguished gentleman presiding will see his way clear to hold it is a mere limitation upon this provision, and it ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment provides that "no part of this sum shall be used for the payment," etc., purely limiting the provision to the amount appropriated on this bill. In other words, that no sum of money appropriated in this bill shall be used for this purpose. The amendment being a limitation upon the appropriation bill, the Chair holds it is in order, and overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now that the Chair has—and properly, in my judgment—ruled on the point, it ought to be voted down. That amendment, which is for a single year, would read precisely as if it were for all time, and wholly defeats the object of the gentleman from Ohio in his original objection. That amendment takes away the longevity pay of the veterans of the civil war who have been thirty years on the retired list just the same as a second lieutenant of last year, and it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. SULZER. I ask that the substitute be reported as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the amendment be again reported. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Just a word in explanation.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The words "further increased" were not read when that amendment was first read.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This was prepared very carefully. I have gone over the matter with the pay officers of the War Department, and they have pointed out these two classes very clearly. First those already increased, who do not get any more, and second, including those who come hereafter; so that I think it specifies clearly that it does not affect the first or the second.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. As read the last time it is all right.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SULZER. I understood the gentleman from Minnesota had concluded.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have concluded all I care to say.

Mr. SULZER. Just a very few words. Mr. Chairman, I agree substantially with my friend from New Jersey that this amendment, which has now been adopted, and that the whole provision should be voted down; and I trust that there will be enough members on that side of the House to do so. I am glad, at this late day, that the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has begun to see a new light, and that he now wants to reduce the expenditures of the Government. He is now in favor of a little economy, after having been in favor for years of the most extravagant appropriations for military affairs.

In my judgment, this bill carries millions and millions of dollars more than is necessary for the military establishment of the Government. I believe it will be a good thing at this time to vote down this whole provision, in accordance with the views expressed by the gentleman from New Jersey, and I hope enough Republicans will vote with us on this side to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. LACEY. I move to strike out the last word. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that I fully understand this amendment; but if I do, it is to this effect: That the law heretofore fixed the pay of an officer at a certain percentage of the amount given him when on active duty. In addition to that there is the fogle allowance every five years of 10 per cent increase that the law gives to that pay.

The proposition in this bill is to appropriate only a portion of what the law gives this retired officer. If so, and we appropriate four-fifths of what is due the officer, what is to hinder him from going to the Court of Claims and suing for the remainder and getting a judgment against the Government of the United States for that portion of the pay not appropriated for? It does not prevent him getting it in the future. We simply put ourselves in the attitude that we will not change the law, but only appropriate enough to pay for four-fifths or five-sixths of what the law gives the retired officer.

Mr. WARNOCK. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HAY. I would like to be heard on the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURTIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2805. An act granting a pension to Mary Ella Cory;

S. 3103. An act granting an increase of pension to Susan Hays;

S. 2971. An act granting an increase of pension to Silas D. Strong;

S. 1678. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles B. Wingfield;

S. 4319. An act granting an increase of pension to Helen G. Heiner;

S. 2936. An act granting an increase of pension to Berthold Fernow;

S. 3472. An act granting an increase of pension to Zeno T. Griffin;

S. 1512. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Jane Faulkner;

S. 3519. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Cummings;

S. 4072. An act granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Lamden;

S. 493. An act to amend act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia;"

S. 2305. An act granting an increase of pension to Lemuel Grove; and

S. 4658. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Rand.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10486. An act granting a pension to Alida Payne;

H. R. 10044. An act granting an increase of pension to William Larzalere;

H. R. 12315. An act granting an increase of pension to James Todd;

H. R. 1011. An act granting an increase of pension to John S. Ranlett;

H. R. 11418. An act granting an increase of pension to Hannah T. Knowles; and

H. R. 2273. An act granting a pension to Martha A. De Lamater.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WARNOCK. I want to make a few remarks upon this last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WARNOCK. I understand the proposition to be that you can not change existing law under the rules as they now stand. I understand, further, that as claimed by the gentleman that the law enacted in 1870 was open to construction once in the court, and the court held that the retired officers were not entitled, but the Supreme Court held that they were. Now, this amendment offered is open to construction and leaves the matter in doubt. It professes to make an appropriation for this year only as follows:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for the payment of further increase of longevity pay to officers now on the retired list; and officers hereafter retired from active service shall not be allowed or paid therefrom any increase of longevity pay above the sum allowed and paid to such officers at date of retirement.

Mr. PARKER. Still the effect of it is precisely the same as to officers hereafter retired.

Mr. WARNOCK. Ah, it is not limited to that.

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; "and officers hereafter retired."

Mr. WARNOCK. But it is officers on the retired list.

Mr. PARKER. That is the first class. The first one is, "No part of this sum shall be used for further increase of longevity pay of officers on the retired list." Then it goes on, "Officers hereafter shall not be paid any increase at all."

Mr. WARNOCK. How could they be paid further increase when the time had not elapsed?

Mr. PARKER. It means beyond the increased longevity pay.

Mr. WARNOCK. For the five years?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no.

Mr. WARNOCK. Well, it is so open to construction that I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be voted down, and I think when gentlemen on this side of the House understand it as I do and those of us who heard the matter discussed they will not vote it down. This amendment will save the Government every year a considerable sum, and it will only take away from a few men longevity pay which they do not earn. If the gentlemen on this side of the House want to vote for an amendment which will reduce appropriations they will vote for this amendment, because this is just what it does; and I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As I understand, an officer that received longevity pay for ten years—that is, who gets 20 per cent—this amendment stops it there and does not allow him any further longevity pay?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And being on the retired list he can not get any greater longevity pay?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And it applies to the next man that goes onto the retired list, so that he does not get any longevity pay by reason of being on the retired list?

Mr. HAY. No; he gets no pay unless he got it on the active list.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The man who goes upon the retired list does not get longevity pay?

Mr. HAY. Not unless he earned it by being on the active list.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not this allow an officer that goes on the retired list to get the longevity pay that he has earned on the active list?

Mr. HAY. Yes. If he has earned 30 per cent of what they call foggy or longevity pay on the active list, when he is retired he continues to get it; but he does not get the other 10 per cent which he would have been entitled to if he had continued for five years more on the active list?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] or the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, in reference to this matter. I see the appropriation for the retired list seems to be $2,068,391. I would like to inquire of the gentlemen whether that is the complete appropriation for the retired list; whether that is all for the retired list.

Mr. HULL. That is all for the retired list.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform us what the amount appropriated is for the officers on the active list?

Mr. HULL. The bill tells that.

Mr. MANN. I suppose we might be able to figure it out from the bill, but I would like to have the gentleman tell me, if he has it at hand.

Mr. HULL. On page 4 of the bill it provides for paying officers of the line $5,000,000.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I understand the retired list embraces other officers than the officers of the line.

Mr. HULL. So does the active list.

Mr. MANN. What I want to get at is what proportion of the appropriation is now used to pay officers on the active list, and what proportion to pay officers on the retired list.

Mr. HULL. I should say it was a little less than one-third in favor of the retired list.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when we get to the point that the Government is paying for men on the retired list one-third as much as we are for men on the active list it is high time that some amendment of this sort was put into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEMENWAY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, ETC.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the disposition of the military appropriation bill, now under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the House take up the bill (H. R. 10386) for the protection of the President of the United States, the suppression of crime against the Government, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be the special order until disposed of; not, however, to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest that the gentleman include also revenue bills.

Mr. RAY of New York. Very well; not to interfere with appropriation bills or revenue bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman propose now to fix a limit of debate on this bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; my proposition is simply for a continuing order until the bill is disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to make an inquiry. I understand this is the so-called "anarchy bill."

Mr. RAY of New York. It includes something of that kind—the suppression of crime against the Government.

Mr. LACEY. Then, I ask, why not take up the Senate bill on the same subject, so that the measure which has already gone through the other House may be before this House?

Mr. RAY of New York. My proposition is to take up the House bill. The Senate bill has not been acted upon in the committee.

Mr. LACEY. Then it will be necessary to have double action in this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MINORITY REPORT.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that a minority of the Committee on Public Lands be granted leave to file their views on the bill (H. R. 11536) to transfer certain forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, to authorize game and fish protection in forest reserves, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced the following committee assignments:

Committee on the Library—Mr. CONNER of Iowa and Mr. WOOTEN of Texas.

Committee on Banking and Currency—Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

Committee on the Militia—Mr. CONEY of Massachusetts.

Committee on Labor—Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky.

Committee on Enrolled Bills—Mr. RHEA of Virginia.

Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic—Mr. REID of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

 H. R. 7074. An act granting a pension to Benjamin F. Draper;
 H. R. 8293. An act granting a pension to Amanda Jocko;
 H. R. 9397. An act granting a pension to John S. Lewis;
 H. R. 4260. An act to correct the record of James A. Somerville; and
 H. R. 3148. An act for a marine hospital at Buffalo, N. Y.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
 To Mr. STEWART of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, until Friday next, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. HULL (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GROW, from the Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11911) to encourage the establishment of homes in the States and Territories for teaching articulate speech and vocal language to deaf children before they are of school age, so as to fit them to enter the public schools provided for hearing children, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1225); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WANGER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12085) providing for the completion of a light and fog-signal station in the Patapsco River, Maryland, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1228); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13031) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese and persons of Chinese descent, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1231); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11536) to transfer certain forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, to authorize game and fish protection in forest reserves, and for other purposes, submitted the views of the minority of said committee (No. 968, part 2) on said bill; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3525) for relief of Jacob B. Phillips, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1229); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SALMON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7007) for the relief of the legal representative of Maj. William Kendall, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1230); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STORM, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8955) for the relief of Gottlieb Schlecht and Maurice D. Higgins, and for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Bindhammer and Valentine Brasch, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1232); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. GROW, from the Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7480) to encourage industrial education in the several States, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1226); which said bill and report were laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7481) to establish a general system of industrial education in the Territories of the United States and insular dependencies, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1227); which said bill and report were laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1451) to correct the military record of A. W., alias Washington, Huntley, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territories in which they are made or produced, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures; which was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6196) transferring a lot in Woodland Cemetery to city of Quincy, Ill.; and

A bill (H. R. 610) to correct the military record of John F. Antlitz.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1347) for the proper labeling of wine purporting to be champagne, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territories in which they are made or produced, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3797) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver old pieces of ordnance to the Indian war veterans, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 23) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a statue of the late Maj. Gen. Alexander Macomb, United States Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2029) entitling any officer of the Navy or Marine Corps appointed a second lieutenant of artillery to take rank in accordance with the date of his original commission in the Navy or Marine Corps, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12095) to amend section 4883 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the signing of letters patent for inventions, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4099) to provide for a macadamized roadway from the town of Sharpsburg, Md., to the Connecticut monument on the battlefield of Antietam, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3984) granting land for a miners' home, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3821) to extend the time for presentation of claims under the act entitled "An act to reimburse the governors of States and Territories for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army of the United States in the existing war with Spain," approved July 8, 1898, and under acts amendatory thereof, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

The law as it stands now limits the time to the present month and the bill extends it to January, 1903, and is acceptable to the Treasury Department and the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4572) to grant an honorable discharge from the military service to Charles H. Hawley, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

I will state that a similar bill was passed and it was vetoed by the President. A new bill was presented in its stead which obviates the criticisms of the veto, and we have been given informally to understand that it will be accepted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if this is the soldier a bill for whose benefit was vetoed during the present session of Congress?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; it was vetoed two or three weeks ago. The difficulty was purely technical. It was a clerical error.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have noticed that I think three vetoes of bills proposing to correct the records of ex-soldiers have come to the Senate during the present session, and I have been writing ex-soldiers who have been importuning me to introduce bills that I did not think there was any use in doing it—that apparently all such bills were to be vetoed. I hope that is not to be the case.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can explain in a moment what the President's difficulty was.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not necessary that it should be explained now.

Mr. HAWLEY. The original bill revoked the order dismissing Charles H. Hawley from service as a second lieutenant, and directed the issue to him of a certificate of honorable discharge to date the 25th of January, 1863, and provided that he shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged. If I may refer to the other end of the avenue, the objection was to the words directing the Secretary of War to revoke the order dismissing him. It is now changed to "authorized to review and to revoke the order," and a single word, "hereafter," is substituted for "thereafter;" that is all. The phraseology used in the first bill involved, I may say, a constitutional question, because it was a direction, and in a case of that sort it was not thought to be quite acceptable; but an authorization to review instead of a direction to revoke is acceptable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that the bill (S. 3220) providing for an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial district, be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS subsequently, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 3220) providing for an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial district, reported it without amendment, and submitted a supplementary report thereon.

INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there be printed and bound in cloth 12,000 copies of the Revised Course of Study for Indian Schools; 3,000 for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 for the use of the Superintendent of Indian Schools.

DESTRUCTION OF FISH BY DYNAMITE, ETC.

Mr. BARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Attorney-General is hereby directed to examine into the facts relating to the destruction of fish in the shore waters of the United States near the Province of New Brunswick by dynamite or other explosive fishing and to report to the Senate what relief for the same can be given by legislation by Congress.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 171) for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] is authorized to report the joint resolution favorably.

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; I am instructed by the committee to report it back favorably, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reports the joint resolution favorably, and asks for its present consideration. It will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope it will not be considered to-day. I think it ought to lie over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope it will be considered and passed for the reason I shall state. There is no objection made to the men named, and the board is to meet on Tuesday next to go down to Tennessee on official business. If the joint resolution does not fill the vacancies, no quorum can be had next Tuesday.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand from the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and also from the Senator from Tennessee, that the joint resolution has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has. It was considered before the committee this very morning.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the pressing necessity for the consideration of the joint resolution, I will withdraw my suggestion that it lie over for a day, although I should be glad to look at it for a moment.

Mr. BATE. I will state that I was not present in the committee this morning when it was considered, but it was turned over to me when I came in directly afterwards, and the chairman and others informed me that it was considered and acted on this morning, and that I was instructed to report it favorably.

Mr. HAWLEY. The committee instructed me to put it in the hands of the Senator from Tennessee, because one of the chief nominees is a Tennessee man; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Henry E. Palmer of Nebraska, GEORGE W. STEELE of Indiana, WALTER P. BROWNLOW of Tennessee, T. J. Henderson of Illinois, and J. M. Brown of Maine be, and the same hereby are, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States; Henry E. Palmer to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Gen. William J. Sewell, whose term of service expires April 21, 1904. GEORGE W. STEELE to succeed himself—his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902. WALTER P. BROWNLOW to succeed Gen. William B. Franklin, whose term of service expires April 21, 1902. T. J. Henderson to succeed himself—his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902. J. M. Brown to succeed himself—his present term of service expiring April 21, 1902.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that when the Senate adjourns this afternoon it be to meet on Monday next. I trust if this motion prevails it will give an opportunity for the gentlemen who wish to be heard on the pending bill to prepare their speeches.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. FOSTER of Washington in the chair). The Committee on Commerce desired me to say to Senators that they would be in session all day to-morrow after 11 o'clock, and that the hearings for Senators will be concluded on to-morrow. They will be heard at any hour during the day after 11.

IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that House bill 9206 be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine, and to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I submitted an amendment yesterday to the pending bill, which was practically a measure which had been introduced in the House. It had been carefully gone over by the chairman and members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and by others interested, and it was intended to take the place of the provision in regard to process or renovated butter, as found in the bill when it came over to us from the House. I think it is very important that that amendment should be understood by the Senate as the bill is being considered, and I therefore ask that the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in lieu of section 4 the following:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of this act "butter" shall be understood to mean an article of food as defined in "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886; that "adulterated butter" shall be understood to mean a grade of butter produced by mixing, reworking, rechurning in milk or cream, refining, or in any way producing a uniform, purified, or improved product from different lots or parcels of melted or unmelted butter, in which any acid, alkali, chemical, or any substance whatever is introduced or used for the purpose or with the effect of deodorizing or removing therefrom rancidity, and any butter with which there is mixed any substance foreign to butter as herein recognized or understood, with intent or effect of cheapening in cost the product in any way, either through cheaper or inferior ingredients, or with intent or effect of causing the absorption of abnormal quantities of water, milk, or cream: Provided, That in case of the addition of animal fats or vegetable oils the product shall be known and treated as oleomargarine, as defined in the aforesaid act approved August 2, 1886.

That "process butter" or "renovated butter" shall be understood to mean a grade of butter produced by mixing, reworking, rechurning in milk or cream, refining, or in any way producing a uniform, purified, or improved product from different lots or parcels of melted or unmelted butter, and in which no acid, alkali, nor chemical, nor any substance whatever has been used for the purpose or intent of deodorizing or removing rancidity therefrom, and to which no substance or substances foreign to pure butter has been added with intent or effect of cheapening cost or increasing weight of same.

That special taxes are imposed as follows:

Manufacturers of process or renovated butter and of adulterated butter shall pay $600 per year, the payment of which shall cover the tax upon the manufacture of both articles. Every person who engages in the production of process or renovated butter or adulterated butter shall be considered to be a manufacturer thereof.

Dealers in adulterated butter shall pay $48 per year. Every person who sells adulterated butter shall be regarded as a dealer in adulterated butter. And sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section and to the person upon whom they are imposed.

That every person who carries on the business of a manufacturer of process or renovated butter or adulterated butter without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than $5,000; and every person who carries on the business of a dealer in adulterated butter without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by law, besides being liable to the payment of the tax, be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500 for each offense.

That every manufacturer of process or renovated butter or adulterated butter shall file with the collector of internal revenue of the district in which his manufactory is located such notices, inventories, and bonds, shall keep such books and render such returns of material and products, shall put up such signs and affix such number of his factory, and conduct his business under such surveillance of officers and agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require. But the bond required of such manufacturer shall be with sureties satisfactory to the collector of internal revenue, and in a penal sum of not less than $500; and the sum of said bond may be increased from time to time and additional sureties required at the discretion of the collector or under instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

That all adulterated butter shall be packed by the manufacturer thereof in firkins, tubs, or other wooden packages not before used for that purpose, each containing not less than 10 pounds, and marked, stamped, and banded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and all sales made by manufacturers of adulterated butter shall be in original stamped packages.

Dealers in adulterated butter must sell only original or from original stamped packages, and when such original stamped packages are broken the adulterated butter sold from same shall be placed in suitable wooden or paper packages, which shall be marked and banded as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe. Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any adulterated butter in any other form than in new wooden or paper packages as above described, or who packs in any package any adulterated butter in any manner contrary to law, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for each offense not more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not more than two years.

That every manufacturer of adulterated butter shall securely affix, by pasting, on each package containing adulterated butter manufactured by him a label on which shall be printed, besides the number of the manufactory and the district and State in which it is situated, these words: "Notice.—That the manufacturer of the adulterated butter herein contained has complied with all the requirements of law. Every person is cautioned not to use either this package again or the stamp thereon, nor to remove the contents of this package without destroying said stamp, under the penalty provided by law in such cases." Every manufacturer of adulterated butter who neglects to affix such label to any package containing adulterated butter made by him, or sold or offered for sale for or by him, and every person who removes any such label so affixed from any such package shall be fined $50 for each package in respect to which such offense is committed.

That upon adulterated butter, when manufactured or sold or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 10 cents per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof, and any fractional part of a pound shall be taxed as a pound. The tax to be levied by this section shall be represented by coupon stamps, and the provisions of existing laws governing engraving, issuing, sale, accountability, effacement, and destruction of stamps relating to tobacco and snuff, as far as applicable, are hereby made to apply to the stamps provided by this section.

That the provisions of sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, shall apply to manufacturers of "adulterated butter" to an extent necessary to enforce the marking, branding, identification, and regulation of the exportation and importation of adulterated butter.

All parts of an act providing for an inspection of meat for exportation, approved August 30, 1890, and of an act to provide for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate commerce, approved March 3, 1891, and of amendment thereto approved March 2, 1895, which are applicable to the subjects and purposes described in this section shall apply to process or renovated butter. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection to be made, at such times as he may deem proper or necessary, of all factories and storehouses where process or renovated butter is manufactured, packed, or prepared for market, and of the products thereof and materials going into the manufacture of the same for exportation or transmission from one State to another. All process butter and the packages containing the same shall be marked with the words "Process Butter," by marks, label, or brands, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and no process or renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from its place of manufacture into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, until it has been marked as provided in this section. The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful regulations for carrying this section into effect, and shall cause to be ascertained and reported from time to time the quantity and quality of process or renovated butter manufactured, and the character and the condition of the material from which it is made. And he shall also have power to ascertain whether or not materials used in the manufacture of said process or renovated butter are deleterious to health or unwholesome in the finished product, and in case such deleterious or unwholesome materials are found to be used in product intended for exportation or shipment into other States he shall have power to confiscate the same. Any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500 or by imprisonment not less than one month nor more than six months, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in the discussion of this bill there has been a great deal of complaint made, and I think with justice, that the health of the consumer is injured by what is called process or renovated butter. I think the amendment I have offered practically protects, in the most efficient way, the interests of the consumer in that direction, and I hope it will remove some of the objections that Senators on this side have to the bill.

So far as the general bill is concerned, I have been somewhat undecided. For a good many years I have been engaged in the breeding and feeding of beef cattle, and I have, with a great deal of interest, long watched the operations of the improvement which has been made in the production of oleomargarine. Beginning with the experiment of the French chemist. I think the great packing houses of this country have accomplished a wonderful and magnificent achievement. No man can possibly say anything more in favor of oleomargarine than I am willing to say. I believe it to be a healthful product; I believe it to be nutritious; I believe it is an honest and legitimate article of trade, provided it is not sophisticated by the use of color and people imposed upon and induced to use it as butter. It is an article of commerce with such merit that it astonishes me that the oleomargarine manufacturers themselves do not come out openly and boldly and advertise it as such. It has advantages over butter. It requires a higher temperature to melt it; it is not subject to the changes of decomposition, which affect butter so severely, and which make it so perishable, and for camp use, for the use of miners, and in a thousand other ways oleomargarine is more desirable than butter itself. It is strange that these manufacturers do not so advertise it and claim these merits for it.

The growth of this industry has been something very marvelous. It has gone hand in hand with the development of the wonderful packing interest, that now controls practically the butchering and selling of meats all over this country. These great establishments have practically superseded everywhere the local butcher. They control absolutely the price of the steer on the hoof and the price of every pound of meat sold on the butcher's block throughout the country. It is a magnificent improvement over the old method, and we are supplied with a better class of beef, properly killed, properly cooled, and properly handled, reaching the consumer in the best possible state. They have broadened the use of meat and extended the period when fresh meat can be used throughout the summer, where formerly its use had largely to be abandoned. It is a wonderful achievement; it is a magnificent example of the power of organization and intelligence applied to what we had supposed heretofore would be a field controlled by local interest.

These great packers utilize every possible product of the beef animals which they slaughter. They therefore are enabled to bring about a more economic result. Among the utilizations of the different by-products is this of oleomargarine. These packers have demonstrated that it is a valuable addition to the sum total of the food products of the world.

So far as the great packing establishments of the country are concerned, they are manufacturing and selling oleomargarine in an absolutely honest and legitimate way. I do not think that any evidence has been brought before any of the committees which have had charge of the consideration of this matter which shows that these great packing houses in Chicago, in Kansas City, or in St. Louis in any way deceive or render assistance to those who are deceiving in this matter.

But it does not stop with them. The oleo oil which they manufacture and sell is taken hold of by special concerns that manufacture simply oleomargarine and that are not engaged in any other business. They are the ones who endeavor to assist and help the retail dealers of the country in imposing oleomargarine as a fraudulent article upon the consumer.

For two summers, I believe, I was on the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures engaged in investigating all the adulterations of food products in Chicago and elsewhere, and everywhere we were met with this conflict between the dairy interests of the country and the fraudulent sellers of oleomargarine, assisted, aided, and abetted by the specific manufacturers of oleomargarine. The evidence presented was absolutely overwhelming that a great part of this manufacture is sold as butter. There can be no controversy on that question.

I admit also that we were tremendously disgusted with the amount of duplicity and of false charges that were produced on the dairy side of the case. There has been a great deal of dishonesty and a great deal of selfishness exhibited by that party to this controversy, and it is partly to meet and check some of the injurious effects which result from the illegitimate and improper sale of renovated and process butter that I have offered this amendment.

The oleomargarine business back in 1886 was in danger of becoming a stench in the nostrils of the people. Those engaged in that business at that time resisted the proposed law just as vehemently as they resist the present proposed amendment to that law. They said they would be ruined and driven out of business; they said it was an unjust aggression in the interest of an opposing industry; they denounced it in every possible way; and yet this great industry, which is of so much importance and value to-day, absolutely owes its existence, I believe, to the protection, to the regulation, and to the supervision which was placed upon the industry by that law.

At that time every stock yard in the country was surrounded by people who were buying dead animals, diseased animals, and all sorts of improper fat and other substances, and they were gradually, on account of the enormous profits involved, using such material in this new industry. That was checked, and these scavengers of the stock yard were practically driven out of business by that very act, which has been so much denounced. It has been the salvation of that great industry; and I believe that the regulation which is imposed upon renovated and process butter by the amendment which I have offered will be of equal value to the great dairy interests of this country. They are in danger, I think, of being rendered obnoxious on account of the improper processes used by the manufacturers of renovated, process, or adulterated butter. Because it is to protect the purity of the food products of this country I think that this legislation is justifiable and proper.

As to the interests of the cattlemen being hurt in any possible way I do not for a moment concern myself. The evidence is absolutely conclusive that, even if we should absolutely stop the consumption of oleomargarine in this country, the effect upon the cattle industry of the country would be absolutely inappreciable.

As has been shown, we slaughter about 11,000,000 head of cattle in this country, and the total amount of the value of the product of oleomargarine which is utilized in this country is only about $2,750,000. So that there will be from 25 to 30 cents per steer, and every cattleman knows that that would be absolutely inappreciable.

The great packing interests control, as I have said, the price of cattle in this country, and—I do not say it with any desire to reflect upon them—considering the opportunities that they have had, I think they have acted with wonderful fairness and moderation. They have the power, they are members of all the great live-stock exchanges of the country, and they control practically all the great cattle associations everywhere. The commission men are practically all subordinated to the wishes and interests of the great packing houses. Cattle are sent to the great stock yards of this country to be sold, and the seller meets but four or five buyers, representing these great establishments. Every commission merchant knows that unless he is on good terms with the great packing houses his business is liable to suffer, and consequently it is an easy matter for the live-stock exchanges to pass any kind of resolution that may be supposed to be in the interest of these great establishments.

They, of course, complain that this legislation is liable to injure them in some respects, but I think they exaggerate the difficulties, just as they did in 1886. I think they will not be hurt. Eighty per cent of the product is exported and that can not possibly be affected, and the 20 per cent that remains to be consumed in this country can be consumed, in my judgment, absolutely as well uncolored as colored.

I have tried this article thoroughly myself. I have used oleomargarine in every possible way on my table, in camp, and elsewhere, and I believe it to be a thoroughly good product. I have also used it uncolored, and I am just as willing to use it uncolored as I am to use it colored. There is no amount of consideration, I think, that is due to this claim that the whole thing depends upon its being made palatable by being of a yellow color. I have a letter, which I received this morning, from one of these great establishments, the managers of which are honorable and respectable men in every possible way, from whom I regret even to differ upon a question of this kind.

We are inclined to take issue with you on the color question. The appearance of an article has a great deal to do with its palatability. An article may be palatable and still not appeal to the taste on account of its appearance. Would you like to eat green ice cream?

Well, I could not help laughing when I came to that, for it seemed that my friend was not well informed as to ice cream, as we frequently eat green ice cream here and elsewhere, and enjoy it quite as much as that of any other color. The pistache ice cream is always green.

And yet it would be just as palatable and taste just as well as the beautiful pink punch served at fashionable receptions. Butterine manufacturers have just as much right to use coloring as the dairy people. While the fact has been disputed, the butterine manufacturers contend they were the first to adopt the high yellow standard for our goods, and the dairy people, seeing that it pleased the public, followed suit. You can remember years ago when it used to be said "that must be oleomargarine because it is so yellow."

That seemed to me a little bit amusing. I could not help recalling a day just about ten years ago when I wandered around the pastures of Warlaby, that historic spot in Yorkshire, England, which has been the home of the magnificent herd of short-horn cattle through three generations of the Booth family. My feet were colored with the yellow dust which fell from the blossoms of that beautiful little flower that we call the buttercup. The pastures were yellow with that beautiful flower; and that has been known as the buttercup for centuries. Why? Because it resembles the yellow color which butter has and which must have existed even long before we had any record of the buttercup. And yet my friend says the yellow color of butter became fashionable here and was first initiated by the manufacturers of oleomargarine.

The writer of this letter further says:

We know that very light butter is preferred in some markets; but the very lightest butter that can be produced looks palatable, while uncolored butterine looks extremely unpalatable, for the reason that it has a dirty white shade. If it possessed a tinge of yellow it would perhaps appeal more to the buyer.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that comment is unnecessary upon that kind of claim. I had not myself observed that uncolored oleomargarine was a dirty white. The white color would not be so attractive, but it seems to me that it is not an unpalatable color. On our farms in the winter time we continually use butter which is practically of the same color. As my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] said yesterday, as a matter of course butter has always more or less of a yellow tinge, unless the feed is absolutely confined to bran and water; but if you feed any kind of good clover or timothy hay there will be a slight color in the butter. That color, however, is a quality which belongs to butter, and should not be taken and used as a mask for any other product.

I have received several telegrams this morning from creamery concerns all over the country, which commend the amendment I have offered. While there is a great deal of human nature and selfishness on both sides of this controversy, yet I believe the creamery men of the country are willing to be fair and just in this matter. They demand that which is theirs of right, and nothing more. They do not desire to impose any hardship upon the manufacturers of oleomargarine. They are willing to meet a fair, honest competition; and my friends all through the West, who are interested in the production of beef cattle, are willing to yield to that kind of competition. The beef-cattle men of the West have no fear of any disastrous results to them. They are perfectly willing that everything shall stand strictly upon its own merits and that honest dealing shall be used in every possible way in handling their products.

The cattlemen of the West are a great big-hearted, broad-souled set of men; they live in the open; their lungs are filled with pure air, and their veins are filled with good, warm, red blood. I denounce and deny as a cattleman that the owners of the great cattle ranges and farms of the country are in any way whatever in sympathy with this false pretense that is being made use of by a part only of the manufacturers and dealers in oleomargarine that is offered for sale throughout the country.

The interest of the laboring man has been brought in here, and laboring men have been appealed to here and there over the country in the mistaken idea that this bill means the prohibition of the manufacture of oleomargarine. I have talked with laboring men, members of labor organizations, who have sent in petitions here, and they were astonished to learn that this bill does not mean anything like a prohibition of the manufacture of oleomargarine; that they can still continue to buy oleomargarine; that they can still continue to have all the advantages which it is supposed to possess over butter; that they can take it themselves, and the housewife, if she so desires, by a very simple process can give it any color she pleases.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for just a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will not the effect of this legislation be to make oleomargarine cheaper for the people who want to use it?

Mr. HARRIS. Unquestionably. I was about to state that the only practical effect upon the laboring man will be that under this legislation he can and ought to be able to buy oleomargarine a cent or three-quarters of a cent a pound cheaper than now. There is no doubt about it. This is in the interest of the laboring man, and there is no reason why he should not buy white oleomargarine and color it to suit himself if he desires to do so.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the testimony of Commissioner of Internal Revenue Wilson before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry last year, in which he said that the demand that oleomargarine be colored came from the purchasers of oleomargarine and the retail dealers—the users of the article, the plain laboring people of the country. I call the attention of the Senator to that statement.

Mr. HARRIS. That the demand came from the purchasers?

Mr. CULBERSON. That it came from the users, the consumers, the purchasers.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, we had before the Committee on Manufactures in Chicago one of the most notorious violators of the law in regard to this matter that we have met, the man who, I believe, was alluded to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] yesterday, who is continually in the courts. In reply to some questions with regard to the matter of coloring, he said: "The very men who come to us and whisper in our ears that they want oleomargarine want that kind which is colored yellow; and the people would think we were cheap skates"—I remember the expression perfectly well—"if we were to let it be known that we are purchasing and using oleomargarine on our table."

There may be, Mr. President, a class of people who are willing to deceive their friends and their children in that kind of way, but I must confess that I have very little sympathy for them. The real laboring man who desires yellow oleomargarine, as I have said, can purchase it white and in a few minutes can change it to yellow. It is like the preparation of any other article that comes upon the table; it can be prepared to suit the taste of the particular individual or family who consume it. There is no difficulty whatever about that. But he knows exactly what he is using.

There is one other class I have heard of who are perhaps affected in this way. I have been told that letters have been received from people who keep large boarding schools and large establishments of that character, who say that the children are crying for oleomargarine colored, but they would not eat it white. I should like to have those children given a chance to see which they prefer at all events.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know whether the Senator has spoken on that point, but I should like to hear him also as to the coloring of cow butter, and whether he has made any investigation of that matter?

Mr. HARRIS. If it comes to the question of coloring cow butter, I think I shall have to refer the Senator from Nevada to the subtle alchemy which exists in the digestive process of the cow herself. She is responsible for the color in the butter. It is there, as I said earlier in my remarks, all the time except when she is fed on unnatural and abnormal feed. Natural feed produces color in the butter.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question, suggested by the question of the Senator from Nevada. Does not the creamery as well as the cow have something to do with the coloring of butter?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; but the cow begins the process.

Mr. MONEY. But at times she gives us yellow butter, and at other times she gives us white butter.

Mr. HARRIS. I have said that there are certain seasons in the year, perhaps in the Senator's part of the country, when the hay crop is short and cows have to be fed on cotton-seed meal, when they produce an article that looks very much like lard; but if the Senator will improve his farming, raise more clover hay, and feed his cows on that kind of feed in the winter, he will find the butter always more or less yellow.

I admit—and of course there is nobody who controverts the idea—that dairymen, for the sake of uniformity, as the color of butter varies from one season of the year to another, do use artificial coloring matter; but the product is none the less butter. They do not color it in order to make it resemble oleomargarine; they do not color it in order to make it resemble any other product on earth; there is no deception or fraud whatever so far as the real character of the article is concerned; and that is the crucial point in the manufacture of oleomargarine, that the coloring is introduced for the purpose of enabling it to be sold for something which it is not, whilst in the butter it is introduced merely for the sake of uniformity in color, and it is not pretended to be anything else but butter all the time.

I think that is the consideration that finally determined me in this matter. I could not see in the cloud of charges, the crimination and recrimination through each stage of this quarrel, any other way to do than to adhere to the plain, simple, honest principle of requiring everything which we have to use as food to stand upon its own merits.

I am in favor of pure-food legislation. I am in favor of every article of food being sold to the people for exactly what it is. I do not believe in maple sirup made in the magnificent corn State of my friend from Iowa; I do not believe in honey which purports to come from California, but which is manufactured at a glucose factory in New Jersey; I do not believe in strawberry jelly or jam 90 per cent of which is made from apple parings and apple cores, and we all know that is the process used in the manufacture of that article. I do not want any of those things. It is a plain, simple proposition, as I have stated, of honesty in the essential matter of food products. We are improving in that direction, and that feeling is growing all over the country.

As a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures, I was astounded at the extent to which adulteration is carried on in some of our food products. We have got to take some steps in that direction, and I believe the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures to-day reported a bill, which I hope will be passed, which would be a long step in the right direction. It is almost impossible to buy any spice that is not adulterated or sophisticated; it is impossible to buy any article of confectionery that is not adulterated or sophisticated; it is impossible to buy any kind of pickles that are not injuriously sophisticated or adulterated. You can not even buy an ounce of ground ginger without finding old rope ground up in it and other adulterants. It is that kind of greedy, heartless, selfish, remorseless grasping for the dishonest dollar that I think we ought to take some measures to stop. No matter whether it hits the great manufacturing establishments, no matter whether it hits the little pickle factories down in the dirty little alleys, no matter where it hits, let us be honest in the sale of the food products in this country.

Of course my friends on this side of the Chamber are very much concerned over the constitutionality of this bill, and I was staggered for a long time prior to 1886; but the message of Mr. Cleveland—delivered at the time he signed the original oleomargarine bill—largely cleared up my mind on that matter. That law has been upon the statute book for sixteen years; it has been assailed in every possible direction by the most tremendous aggregations of capital, and yet it stands upon the statute book unshaken in its integrity. Now, it seems to me late in the day, when an amendment is proposed simply to carry on the good work, simply to make that measure more effective, to attack this kind of legislation from that standpoint. As Mr. Cleveland said:

Having entered upon this legislation, it is manifestly a duty to render it as effective as possible in the accomplishment of all the good which should legitimately follow in its train.

If there had been objections to that law of a constitutional character, the courts certainly would have decided those questions long ago.

I will ask, Mr. President, that the Secretary read a further extract from the same message of Mr. Cleveland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

If this article has the merit which its friends claim for it, and if the people of the land, with full knowledge of its real character, desire to purchase and use it, the taxes exacted by this bill will permit a fair profit to both manufacturer and dealer. If the existence of the commodity taxed and the profits of its manufacture and sale depend upon disposing of it to the people for something else which it deceitfully imitates, the entire enterprise is a fraud and not an industry; and if it can not endure the exhibition of its real character, which will be effected by the inspection, supervision, and stamping which this bill directs, the sooner it is destroyed the better in the interest of fair dealing.

Such a result would not furnish the first instance in the history of legislation in which a revenue bill produced a benefit which was merely incidental to its main purpose.

There is certainly no industry better entitled to the incidental advantages which may follow this legislation than our farming and dairy interests, and to none of our people should they be less begrudged than our farmers and dairymen. The present depression of their occupations, the hard, steady, and often unremunerative toil which such occupations exact, and the burdens of taxation which our agriculturists necessarily bear, entitle them to every legitimate consideration.

Nor should there be opposition to the incidental effect of this legislation on the part of those who profess to be engaged honestly and fairly in the manufacture and sale of a wholesome and valuable article of food which by its provisions may be subject to taxation. As long as their business is carried on under cover and by false pretenses, such men have bad companions in those whose manufactures, however vile and harmful, take their place without challenge with the better sort in a common crusade of deceit against the public. But if this occupation and its methods are forced into the light and all these manufactures must thus either stand upon their merits or fall, the good and bad must soon part company and the fittest only will survive.

Not the least important incident related to this legislation is the defense afforded to the consumer against the fraudulent substitution and sale of an imitation for a genuine article of food of very general household use. Notwithstanding the immense quantity of the article described in this bill which is sold to the people for their consumption as food, and notwithstanding the claim made that its manufacture supplies a cheap substitute for butter, I venture to say that hardly a pound ever entered a poor man's house under its real name and in its true character.

While in its relation to an article of this description there should be no governmental regulations of what the citizen shall eat, it is certainly not a cause of regret if by legislation of this character he is afforded a means by which he may better protect himself against imposition in meeting the needs and wants of his daily life.

Having entered upon this legislation, it is manifestly a duty to render it as effective as possible in the accomplishment of all the good which should legitimately follow in its train.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I do not believe that I care to take up the time of the Senate any further. This is all, it seems to me, a simple proposition, and when it is rightly understood I believe this bill will receive the approval of every man who desires to protect all classes of people in every possible enjoyment of good health and in their pocketbooks. If I believed that oleomargarine was in the least unhealthful I should be in favor of abolishing it altogether. We in the Committee on Manufactures have divided food products into two classes; one where the adulteration is deleterious to health and injurious, and we wish to abolish that class wholly and altogether; another class is where it is merely a sophistication and a fraud upon the pocketbook.

I regard oleomargarine as it is improperly sold, as it is sold as butter, merely as a fraud upon the pocketbook. I do not condemn it as unhealthful in every possible way. It is difficult, it is almost impossible for anyone to detect one from the other. You can not tell. A good deal was said the other day about how readily you can tell butter from oleomargarine. I have tried it in every possible way, and I can not detect the difference between good oleomargarine and good butter. You can tell bad butter readily enough. There is no trouble about that. There is only one simple method by which the consumers can protect themselves. Inquired of the chemical bureau of the Department of Agriculture, and I found that the only simple method by which to detect the difference between the two is by taking a small quantity of each in a spoon, letting it melt, stirring it gently with a toothpick or match as it melts over a flame, and the butter will froth up, will assume a light appearance and gradually subside into a fine delicate oil, whereas the oleomargarine quietly melts down with a few bubbles like some wax would melt, and it requires, of course, a higher temperature than the butter does.

But the peculiar quality of butter is that it foams when subjected to heat. It gets light; and it has that effect when used in bread or in any other possible way. That is the reason why it has a greater superiority in point of digestibility, in my opinion, but not enough so to require us to brand oleomargarine in any possible way as unhealthful to the ordinary consumer.

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] introduced some tables that I think are of great interest in this matter. I ask that they be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Sweden	22,000,000
Germany	220,000,000
Netherlands	123,000,000
Belgium	20,000,000

Table 7 indicates that Germany is the greatest producer of oleomargarine, with a product of 220,000,000 pounds, followed by the Netherlands, with 123,000,000 pounds. According to the figures of this table, the United States, with an output of more than 100,000,000 pounds, ranks third in production.

COTTON-SEED OIL.

Amount of oil produced in 1900 in United States	93,325,729	$21,390,674	22.9

Amount exported: 50.25 per cent of gallons, and 66.5 per cent of value.

In regard to the production of oleo oil Bulletin No. 128 has the following statement:

"The number of grades manufactured is from three to five, and, when the market is active and prices are high, about all the fat taken in slaughtering, both from cattle and sheep, is worked into one grade or another. The oil made from sheep fat can not be neutralized, and retains the characteristic odor and flavor of the animal to such degree as to be unfit for the oleomargarine demanded in American markets. It is exported to Europe, where there is demand for cheaper oils. With the beef fats the character of the animal from which they are taken is the most potent factor in the selection. Some manufacturers work into their highest grade of oleo oil practically all the fat taken from a good steer, and make one or two lower grades from the fat of cows and "canners."

This statement is derived from the manufacturers themselves by the census agents.

"Other manufacturers make the highest grade from the caul and other selected fats of the best beeves, using certain intestinal and other lower forms, together with that taken from poorer animals, in making from one to three lower grades. As previously indicated, the manufacture of oleo oil is more widely distributed than that of neutral lard, and while it is largely confined to the big packing houses, considerable quantities are made in large cities, outside the centers of the packing industry, from fats collected in part from abattoirs and in part from retail butchers."

This extract from the bulletin suggests possibilities in the way of deleterious materials from which the oil may be produced on which I will not enlarge. From Tables 6 and 8 of Bulletin No. 138 the following facts appear:

Prospectus of the Standard Butterine Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of West Virginia, U. S. A., capital stock, $1,000,000. Standard Butterine Company, W. P. Wilkins, president; offices, 208 Ninth street NW, Washington, D. C., U. S. A., September 1, 1900.

TABLE OF COST AND PROFITS.

It is perhaps best to add to this prospectus a statement of the exact cost of and profits in the manufacture of butterine, compiled from manufacturing statistics and recent market quotations.

Cost, showing proportions used for each 100 pounds.

Oleo oil, 32 pounds, at 9½ cents per pound.....	$3.04
Neutral lard, 17 pounds, at 8½ cents per pound.....	1.44½
Cotton oil, 17 pounds, at 5 cents per pound.....	.85
Milk, 17 pounds, at 1 cent per pound.....	.17
Salt, 7 pounds, at ½ cent per pound.....	.03½
Moisture, 10 pounds, at 00 per pound.....	.00

100 pounds.....	5.54
Labor, parchment paper, tubs, etc.....	1.38
Internal revenue, 2 cents per pound.....	2.00

Total cost (f. o. b. Washington).....

The above cost when deducted from the market price of $13 per 100 pounds shows a net profit of $4.03.

It will be seen that even if the company produced only the 400,000 pounds per month for which it now has definite orders, a net profit of over $16,320 a month, or $195,840 a year, would be assured.

This would mean 8 per cent on the preferred stock of the company, or 20 per cent of the entire capitalization.

This is a simple statement of actual facts which can be easily verified.

This showing surely ought to be of interest to everybody with money for which a highly profitable investment is desired.

STOCK.

The Standard Butterine Company is incorporated, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided as follows:

Five thousand shares preferred, full paid, nonassessable—par value, $100 per share—$500,000.

Five thousand shares common stock, $500,000.

BONDS.

There are also $150,000 in bonds, divided into 150 bonds, at $1,000 each, paying an interest at 6 per cent per annum.

The preferred stock is guaranteed to pay 8 per cent per annum, and the common stock ought, by conservative estimate, to pay at least 15 per cent after the first year of business.

Mr. QUARLES obtained the floor.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi for a moment. If there is no possible objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, and it could be adopted, as it involves some other verbal amendments in other portions of the bill, I would ask to have it reprinted. But if there is any single Senator who objects to its being adopted, there is a very thin Senate present and I will not ask it.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator from Vermont did me the honor to consult me a moment ago, and I then told him there was no objection, but since then, not then having read the amendment, I find this article is not taxed, and that would take it beyond the supervision of anyone in particular. I would rather have a tax put on it, so that it would come under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury and the people employed by him to see that the law is enforced in this matter as well as with respect to oleomargarine. I think it nothing but fair that this product should be taxed just as oleomargarine is.

Mr. HARRIS. There is in the amendment a tax of 10 cents a pound on adulterated butter.

Mr. MONEY. Does it put on a tax of 10 cents per pound?

Mr. HARRIS. Ten cents a pound upon the butter which is found to be adulterated, where any foreign substance is used in its composition. On page 6 this provision will be found:

That upon adulterated butter, when manufactured or sold or removed for consumption or use, there shall be assessed and collected a tax of 10 cents per pound, to be paid by the manufacturer thereof, and any fractional part of a pound shall be taxed as a pound.

Mr. STEWART. I wished to move an amendment, when I heard it read, to include colored butter.

Mr. HEITFELD. I desire to state that in reading the amendment I find there is a tax upon adulterated butter, but no tax upon renovated butter. I believe that the amendment provides that renovated butter shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, while the other would be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Therefore, I suggest that it be amended to the extent of putting renovated butter under the same tax that is imposed on uncolored oleomargarine, so that it would be policed and governed by the same Government official.

Mr. HARRIS. That class of manufacture which is described as "process butter" or "renovated butter," as distinguished from adulterated butter, indicates—

A grade of butter produced by mixing, reworking, reurning in milk or cream, refining, or in any way producing a uniform, purified, or improved product from different lots or parcels of melted or unmelted butter, and in which no acid, alkali, nor chemical, nor any substance whatever has been used for the purpose or intent of deodorizing or removing rancidity therefrom, and to which no substance or substances foreign to pure butter has been added.

The manufacturer of that product is required to pay a tax of $600 a year and is required to give bond and is required to conduct his business—and I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to this provision—under such surveillance of officers and agents as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require.

And further than that, his place of manufacture is also brought under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, so that he is practically covered by all the safeguards of both Departments.

Mr. STEWART. It says "nor any substance whatever." Would not that include coloring matter?

Mr. HARRIS. I will let the Senator make his own interpretation.

Mr. STEWART. If it would include coloring matter, the amendment would cover the matter, it seems to me.

Mr. HARRIS. Those are the words in the amendment—"nor any substance whatever."

Mr. MONEY. I should like to know the meaning placed upon the words by the Senator who framed the amendment and introduced it. Does it include coloring matter?

Mr. HARRIS. I think strictly construed it would. I think there is no question as to what the words mean. I will say so far as I am concerned, that I am perfectly willing to require that class of butter to pay the one-fourth of a cent a pound which is required of uncolored oleomargarine.

Mr. MONEY. Uncolored oleomargarine?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; uncolored oleomargarine.

Mr. MONEY. It seems to me, as renovated butter is a substance which is not wholesome—

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that there is any authority for that statement. Adulterated butter is the class referred to.

Mr. MONEY. I have not heard of any testimony before the committee of either House which did not show that butter was renovated by introducing into it deodorizing chemicals, and I believe sterilizing chemicals, for the purpose of getting out bacteria, and by inserting coloring matter to give it an appearance to suit the public eye and taste in the matter. I do not know of any other butter than that which is called renovated.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, yes; there is another class of what might be called renovated butter in which no acids or alkalis or chemicals of any kind are used; a better class of butter, which is melted, mixed, and churned over with cream to give it freshness.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator put in the word "colored," or whatever is necessary there?

Mr. HARRIS. No; because butter has a natural color and you can not take the color out of it.

Mr. STEWART. We do not want to take the color out of it, but we object to putting it in.

Mr. HARRIS. The cow put it in.

Mr. STEWART. If the cow put it in, let it stay there, but do not put it there. If the amendment includes putting in coloring matter into any kind of butter, I think it might get my vote, perhaps. That is the point with me.

Mr. MONEY. I should very much prefer, if the Senator from Kansas means that it shall not be colored, that he would say so in the amendment. I will offer an amendment to that effect, if he will accept it; and if he does, then accept his.

Mr. HARRIS. I am perfectly willing to accept an additional tax, if you think that is necessary.

Mr. MONEY. And include the word "colored?"

Mr. HARRIS. No; I would not be willing to do that, because I believe it infringes upon a just right which the man who handles pure butter, real butter, has.

Mr. STEWART. The right to color it?

Mr. MONEY. The great mass of butter consumed in the United States, except where it is consumed where it is made, on the farm, is colored. Whatever the natural color may be, an artificial coloring is put in in every creamery in the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. For the sake of uniformity.

Mr. MONEY. For the sake of making it attractive and getting a sale, and that is a fact well known to the trade, as proven by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] yesterday in the case of the oleomargarine manufacturer who sent round a card with different colors, wanting to know what shade the customer wanted. That was simply appealing to the taste.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe that card was sent around by an oleomargarine manufacturer.

Mr. MONEY. And the creameries consult the public taste just as the oleomargarine man does. He wants to produce something to please the public. The people prefer to eat a yellow butter, because it is richer than white butter. It is richer in fat than white butter. My contention all the time about the coloring business has been not that oleomargarine is colored simply to imitate butter, but that butter and oleomargarine are both colored for the purpose of pleasing the public who buy and consume it, and for no other reason. I do not believe that oleomargarine is colored in order to deceive anybody, so as to make them take it for butter, but because the public want yellow butter.

I made an allusion the other day to hotels trying to set the fashion of eating white butter, and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin asked me whether I thought the oleomargarine men would not immediately leave out the coloring matter if that kind of butter came in vogue. I answered frankly that I thought they would, not because they wanted to imitate butter, but because they would want to consult the taste of the people who pay for and eat the article.

So I would prefer to have the amendment amended in that way, if the Senator will accept it. This is just as much a process as the other. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], with his usual candor and his usual fairness—because I believe the Senator from Kansas is as fair a man as there is anywhere—has admitted that oleomargarine is a good and wholesome product, and that he does not desire to circumscribe its sale, and all that sort of thing. I contend, and the experts bear me out, that process butter is not healthful. Yet it is permitted to be colored and to be sold as butter with all of its injurious ingredients—renovated or resurrected, as some of the witnesses called it before the committee.

Mr. PROCTOR. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] yielded to me for a moment, if there is any doubt about this amendment being accepted, and about its being satisfactory to everybody, I think it had better go over.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be printed.

Mr. MONEY. Let it go over.

Mr. PROCTOR. It has been printed.

Mr. MONEY. It has been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Chair understands that the amendment has been printed.

Mr. MONEY. I hope I may be allowed a moment to refer to a matter to which the Senator from Kansas alluded. It is not material. He spoke of the white butter made in Mississippi, and said we do not have grass there. He is very much mistaken. We have the Bermuda grass, the finest grass ever grown out of soil, not even excepting the blue grass of Kentucky. Then we have what is called the black or prairie belt—the finest grass and cereal producing country I know of. There they have elegant creameries. I know of one there, because I have a petition from the neighborhood asking me to vote for this bill. I do not believe there is any finer butter made in the world than there is there. The largest registered herd of Jersey cattle in the country is in Mississippi.

Mr. HARRIS. I take great pleasure in withdrawing what I said as to the inferior agriculture of Mississippi, and I congratulate the Senator that it is in so much better condition.

Mr. MONEY. I knew the Senator would when he had the facts.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, things have come to a strange pass when the steer competes with the cow as a butter maker. When the hog conspires with the steer to monopolize the dairy business, it is time for self-respecting men to take up the cudgels for the cow and defend her time-honored prerogatives. As a matter of poetic justice, if nothing else, we ought not to forget the bountiful favors of earlier years that were conferred by that faithful creature, and we ought not now to desert her or to permit her to be displaced, her sweet and wholesome product supplanted by an artificial compound of grease which may be chemically pure but has never known the fragrance of clover, the freshness of the dew, or the exquisite flavor which nature bestows exclusively on butter fat to adapt it to the taste of man.

Mr. President, I desire butter that comes from the dairy, not from the slaughterhouse. I want butter that has the natural aroma of life and health. I decline to accept as a substitute caul fat, matured under the chill of death, blended with vegetable oils, and flavored by chemical tricks. The man who makes this compound may have clean hands; he may wear a clean, white apron, but he is no friend of mine.

Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin has invested in dairies over a hundred and seventy-five million dollars. The annual product of that investment is over $40,000,000. The best part of our agricultural domain has been dedicated to this great industry. No man representing that State here would discharge his duty if he remained silent when the chief industry of his State was assailed, her greatest product imperiled by a cheap and spurious substitute, and 175,000 of her best citizens disturbed in their regular employment.

In addition to these matters of State concern, Mr. President, I wish to remind you that there are 5,000,000 American dairymen now appealing as a matter of right for commercial honesty and fair dealing in the American markets. They are men of high intelligence, who seldom ask for legislation. But, sir, when 110,000,000 pounds of counterfeit product has in a single year forced its way into the American market as butter—has been sold for butter and bought for butter; when State jurisdiction has been found utterly impotent to protect that great interest—what wonder is it that these men come here with a dignified appeal for Federal protection?

Mr. President, this measure is what on its face it purports to be—a revenue bill. As such I defend it. It has been charged on the other side that while having the semblance of a revenue bill it is in truth and in fact an illicit exercise of the police power of the State; and the first suggestion which comes from the other side is that we are not in need of revenue. That is a proper question to raise and settle here.

We must remember that at this session of Congress, by a bill recently passed by both Houses, we have taken away $78,000,000 of the annual revenue of this Government. If the great projects now contemplated are to be undertaken, we shall certainly need additional revenue. But it is said that this bill will not yield revenue. It is insisted that this bill is calculated to crush out the manufacture of oleomargarine and that the result of the enactment will be no revenue whatever. It is to this point that I wish to direct attention for a moment.

It will be noticed that the manufacturers of oleomargarine have been all the time directing attention to the importance of the matter of color. They have been educating the people to believe that it is a vital matter in the sale and disposition of oleomargarine; that without it they would be unable to dispose of their product. I infer from this that the policy of the manufacturers can not be changed at once so as to produce a white oleomargarine. I infer, therefore, that at least one-half of the oleomargarine that shall be manufactured in the coming year will be colored, and if so this bill will yield at least $5,000,000 in the next year.

Now, let me call your attention to another proposition. It has been repeatedly asserted on this floor that a 10-cent tax is prohibitive; that no oleomargarine can possibly be made to pay this 10-cent tax and still compete with butter. Nothing is further from the truth. The report of the Twelfth Census shows that the average price paid to the manufacturer during the last year for oleomargarine is 11 cents and a fraction. Call it 11 cents, if you please. That 11 cents, as you will see, covers the 2-cent tax and the manufacturers' profit.

I assert that when the tax is 10 cents and butter is 23 cents the margin is as great in favor of oleomargarine as it is when the tax is 2 cents a pound and the price of butter is 15 cents. The margin is the same, as you will see by computing it.

Now, I direct your attention to the report of the hearings before the committee last year, on page 558. There you will find a compilation of the monthly production and the monthly price of butter compared with the production of oleomargarine month by month. This table discloses that in 1893, and, indeed, in several other years, when the price of butter was 15 cents and oleomargarine was paying a 2-cent tax, its production went on and reached 3,000,000 pounds a month, even as early as 1893, when the production of this article was really in its infancy.

I say that if oleomargarine with a 2-cent tax could compete with butter at 15 cents in 1893, then, with a 10-cent tax, whenever butter is 23 cents, there is an equal margin and an equal opportunity for the butterine manufacturer; and, of course, when butter advances above 23 cents, then there is that much larger profit to the oleomargarine manufacturer.

If butter should remain at its present price and the retailer could obtain oleomargarine at the present cost, there would, after paying the 10-cent tax, remain a much larger profit for oleomargarine than butter has ever yielded. Here is the formula: Eleven cents, the manufacturers' price, includes 2 cents of tax; add 8 cents to cover balance of tax and 19 cents will stand as the cost price of butterine. When butter commands 30 cents in the market, there will be a profit of 11 cents for every pound of colored butterine that can be sold as butter. Now, it is well known that the retailer of butter is satisfied with a profit ranging from 2 to 5 cents. Will not the thrifty retailer still prefer to sell butterine under above conditions? What warrant has any man for saying that this enactment will prove prohibitory?

A perusal of this table will show that in all probability oleomargarine in the future will be colored notwithstanding this legislation and will yield a considerable revenue.

But it is said, sir, that this act is unconstitutional. I have been utterly unable to understand the ground upon which that contention rests. The Constitution confers upon Congress the taxing power absolutely, without any limitation whatever. Congress certainly has the right to select the articles upon which it will impose taxation, and that selection may properly be made—nay, it always has been made—largely with reference to the character of the article in question.

I suppose that it does not cost over 12 cents to manufacture a gallon of whisky, and still we impose upon that article a tax of $1.20, which is ten times the cost of production. Why is that done? Why is that article singled out by Congress to bear such an enormous burden? Of course I need not suggest to any Senator on this floor that it is because in the opinion of many, if not most persons, it is a deleterious article, whose influence upon society is harmful. So alcohol, which costs a little more to produce, bears a tax of $2.25, if I remember aright.

Let me call your attention, Senators, to the bill which passed the Senate just the other day—the tax-reduction bill, as it is called. Congress has seen fit to relieve every one of the industries which was bearing that unusual burden, except only bucket shops. Congress reserves the right to release all others and still let bucket shops bear the burden known as the war tax. Why? Because, in the opinion of Congress, the influence of a bucket shop is unwholesome. Does any man doubt the right of Congress to impose the tax upon that ground? There was not a voice raised in either House of Congress in favor of repealing the tax on the bucket shops.

In the same way Congress selects oleomargarine that has been colored in semblance of butter—that is, fraudulent oleomargarine—and says here is a product which is the result of a conspiracy; it is a continuing fraud upon the public, and we will select that article to bear a tax of 10 cents a pound.

I would call your attention to the fact that under the act of 1886, which imposed only a 2-cent tax on oleomargarine, the revenues were increased by from two to three million dollars annually.

Let me say in regard to the Constitution, that ever since I have known anything about politics our friends in the Democratic party have been sitting up with the Constitution like a trained nurse. I am therefore not surprised that in this simple matter of the imposition of a tax upon an article because it is a fraud the Constitution should be resorted to again as an impediment.

But, Mr. President, no lawyer on this floor will stand in his place and assert that this bill, if enacted by Congress and signed by the President, will ever be in any danger of being set aside on any constitutional ground. Of course it is familiar and elementary that no judicial tribunal will ever review the discretion with which Congress is here vested by the Constitution over the subject of taxation. Therefore no Senator, in my judgment, need have the slightest hesitation in voting for this measure upon any constitutional ground. The police power has failed signally in its effort to protect an honest industry or to strike down a counterfeit, and I submit that it would be mockery to now turn these dairymen over to the jurisdiction which has been utterly impotent to protect their rights.

Mr. President, I am not to be deterred from supporting a revenue measure because it will accomplish an incidental benefit which may by some be thought more important than the major purpose of the bill. There is no occasion to apologize for this bill because, incidentally, it will protect the American people from fraud. It is too late in the history of Federal legislation to challenge a revenue measure because it has an incidental purpose. That proposition has been discussed for so many years that it has been considered settled, and the American people at the ballot box have recorded their verdict upon it.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to state the basic proposition upon which the contention of the dairyman rests, and upon which he predicates his demand for protection. Butter has a color, flavor, and grain that were known of all men everywhere, recognized in every market, many years before the siege of Paris, out of whose trials and privations came the first suggestion of oleo. In another place some one contemptuously asked, "Has the dairyman, forsooth, a patent upon this color, which is known as the butter color?" Yes, Mr. President, nature has conferred her letters patent. The color in dispute is imprinted by God's sunshine, and you might as well deny to the modest buttercup of spring its yellow tint or the right of the violet to its shade of blue. The great artist makes no mistake in the use of colors, and the American people will make no mistake if they demand butter that has been sanctified by the sunshine. In the sunny month of June, by its own weird processes, nature gives to milk and butter a peculiar shade that is recognized and known as exclusive and distinctive as the badge and attribute of butter.

Mr. President, butter has another monopoly traced to the same great origin, and that is that wonderfully delicate and delicious flavor. It is distilled in the crucibles of nature under the summer sky, in field and meadow, where the bobolink and the bee practice their sweet incantations. It is conferred by the same great power that gives to the rose its distinctive fragrance; so delicate is it that no chemist can reproduce or even imitate it.

These are the attributes, the trade attributes, if you please, the natural trade-marks, that butter has which were recognized as belonging to it by the consensus of mankind and had earned for it a universal demand.

That good will, that trade-mark, became appurtenant to that business, and it follows that every butter maker who, by his skill and effort, had helped to build up the reputation of that product had a proprietary interest in that trade-mark and in that good will. They belonged to him. They were his to have and to hold, and were of incalculable value. This proposition is so plain and so equitable that it will not be denied either here or elsewhere.

Let me illustrate for a moment. A few days ago it transpired in a committee hearing of this body that a counterfeit product was being produced to take the place of jellies and jams made from preserved fruit. What did the evidence show? It showed that the people who manufacture that miserable counterfeit took the parings and the cores of apples—the refuse gathered up at the hotels and restaurants—and by jockeying and doctoring with chemical colorings and flavorings they produced an article that could not be detected by the eye, the nose, or the taste from the original. Still there was not a bit of fruit in it.

This is the proposition I wish to enforce as a matter of natural justice and commercial honesty. Should the man who for years, perhaps for a lifetime, has been building up a legitimate business in the preserving of fruits, gathering in the most ripe and delicious fruit that could be found in the market, preserving it with the best sirups he could obtain, having acquired a good will for his business, should that man, as a matter of natural justice and right, be compelled to submit to such a competition as that of which I have spoken? No fair-minded man would contend for such a proposition. All will agree that such a counterfeit should be driven out of the market and the honest industry protected. Common honesty should be enforced by common law.

Mr. President, let us leave the proposition of natural right and justice, conferring these property rights upon the honest butter maker, and trace the history of a conspiracy to despoil the butter maker, to take away his profits, and infringe his just claims.

It was when the Germans had the Frenchmen shut up in Paris at the end of the Franco-Prussian war that oleomargarine was first conceived. When famine was pinching the besieged and the necessities of life were obtained with difficulty, a French chemist used his skill and crucible to alleviate distress. His prime purpose was not to make a substitute for butter, but to utilize certain food products that otherwise would be unfit for food. He said, in describing his process, that he took the fat of all animals—he made no distinction—and reduced it by novel methods. He put in bicarbonate of soda for an obvious purpose. He added coloring matter, some pepsin from a cow's udder, and churned it together, and that product he called oleo.

This was a merciful expedient to ameliorate famine, but as soon as its success was understood on this side of the ocean its commercial possibilities attracted the attention of shrewd and unscrupulous men, who saw an opportunity of making a cheap imitation of butter and reaping a rich reward by a species of commercial piracy. In time 84 patents were taken out in this country for the production of patent butter. These patents disclose on their face the motive and purpose of the promoters. They provide for the use of the most powerful acids and deodorizing agents, throwing a ghastly light on the character of the material to be used in the production of patent butter. In Paris the expedient was dictated by necessity, which knows no law; it was promoted here by avarice, which respects no law.

After the experimental stage in this country the production of oleomargarine attracted a large amount of capital, and it progressed marvelously until the dairymen began to cry out against it. State after State exhausted its jurisdiction and its police power to check the growth of this fraud. What was the result? The great manufacturers who then had millions of dollars invested came to the front and said to the retail dealers, "If you will persist and continue to violate these State laws and sell this product we will stand between you and the county jail; we will stand between you and all harm; we will furnish all lawyers; we will provide all bail bonds; we will pay all your fines; now go ahead with your business." Thirty-two States denounced colored oleomargarine as a fraud and branded it as an outlaw, and still those manufacturers, by the means I have indicated, were able to defy this State authority and the legislation came to naught.

What then happened? In 1886 Congress undertook to come to the help of the States, and you remember the original oleomargarine act that was passed. It depended upon brands and marking as well as inspection. But it soon fell out that the retailers were getting an enormous profit, 15 cents on every pound that they could sell for butter at 25 cents. That profit they divided with the manufacturer. When the tub was set up with the marks upon it, only a turn of the wrist was required to change all that in the dark recesses of the ice chest, and oleomargarine was retailed for butter just the same.

Now, let me say right here that from the beginning oleomargarine was a counterfeit. It never came into the market as a substitute for butter or as an independent food product. It came in as a counterfeit with a mask upon it, saying, "I am butter." What methods were adopted to facilitate this fraud? What were the representations that were made to the public? It was put up originally in exactly the same packages that the dairies had used, so that it might simulate a dairy product. It was branded on the outside with the names of favorite dairies—"Oakdale Dairy," "Ferndale Dairy," and many other dairies. Armour & Co. sententiously testified: "Why, we brand that to suit the customer; we give it to him just as he wants it."

Not only so, but the color that belonged to butter was reproduced with great fidelity. The coarse compound of suet and tallow was blended with vegetable oil to secure the grain. The delicate flavor they could not counterfeit, so they stole it outright and mixed in enough high-grade butter to sanctify the mass. Thus they produced an article at a cost of about 8 or 10 cents a pound which was sold for butter, bought for butter, and eaten for butter. I do not hesitate to pronounce this the greatest fraud of the century. The evidence clearly shows that, in defiance of State laws and the act of Congress, from 75 to 95 per cent of that product was retailed as butter. We are seeking simply to amend the act of 1886 to correct a structural defect in that law, so as to accomplish what Congress intended to accomplish by that enactment.

Mr. President, will you have the patience to listen for a moment as to how this pending measure will harmonize with our system of legislation and jurisprudence? This nation has a conspicuous record for enforcing commercial honesty. In the first place, we have the trade-mark law, which is familiar to everyone. It is intended to prevent the counterfeiting or imitation of trade products. A counterfeit, in order to fall under the penalties of that law, need not be an exact imitation, it only needs to come so near the genuine article as to induce purchasers to buy it for the original. What the trade-mark law was intended to punish and discourage is precisely what oleomargarine is doing in the market on a large scale, although, for obvious reasons, the dairymen can have no benefit or protection from the trade-mark law.

As is well known, Congress has jurisdiction to punish fraud in its public service, but has no authority within one of the sovereign States, as an original matter of jurisdiction, to entertain a complaint of that kind. But what have we done? For the purpose of throwing the influence of this great Government against fraud, we have enacted penalties for the use of our mails by fraudulent enterprises. A rigid enforcement of that enactment, which has penalties adequate to punish the fraud, has rid many a State of fraudulent nuisances that might otherwise have escaped the State jurisdiction. So that it may almost be said that this Government has been ingenious in its efforts to acquire jurisdiction to rebuke fraudulent practices.

Next came the filled-cheese legislation of 1896, which involves precisely this principle. A counterfeit article of cheese had been made, which was debauching the cheese market; Congress laid hold upon that fraud, and by the same means invoked in this bill it restored the genuine article to its market, and taxed the fraudulent article out of existence.

Let me remind you, Mr. President, that when that bill was pending here every argument that is now raised on this bill was made. We are but rehearsing stale objections, and every question involved in this controversy is res adjudicata, in so far as the deliberate action of Congress can ever be final upon any question.

The Supreme Court has emphatically indorsed the principle of this bill, and has recognized the right of the State to prohibit and punish the invasion by a counterfeit product.

In the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461) Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The Constitution of the United States does not secure to any one the privilege of defrauding the public. The deception against which the statute of Massachusetts is aimed is an offense against society. The States are as competent to protect their people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of more serious character. And this protection may be given without violating any right secured by the National Constitution and without infringing the authority of the General Government. A State enactment forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food in general use among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to citizens of the United States nor in any just sense interfere with the freedom of commerce among the several States.

So that there remains no doubt that this bill rests upon a just and equitable basis and is in accord with the spirit of our laws and jurisprudence.

Mr. President, this fraud is more universal and more inveterate than any other with which we have had occasion to grapple. It goes to every home in this land—to the mansion and to the cottage. I say "inveterate." The bogus dollar circulates from hand to hand and every man who uses it gets good value for it except the man in whose hands it is finally detected; but every man who uses bogus butter, supposing it to be the genuine article, is injured and defrauded.

This bill is based upon a simple proposition, namely, that every man has a right to buy what he will and to get what he buys. If he wants butter he has a right to have butter; if he wants oleomargarine he ought not to be compelled to pay a butter price in order to get it. That is the simple proposition upon which this legislation rests.

There are two aspects of this fraud, so far as the consumer is concerned. An imitation product is foisted upon him which he does not want. This is an insult. He pays the price of butter—say 30 cents—but gets a product that ought not to cost him 15 cents. That amounts to an injury. Furthermore, the consumer is absolutely helpless to protect himself against this imposition. He calls for butter, pays the price of butter, but, by reason of the skillful imitation in color and grain, he cannot detect the imposture.

Mr. President, allow me for a few moments to speak of the defense that is made here for oleomargarine. Why, it is said, it is wholesome; it tastes just as well and is just as palatable as butter. Is that any answer to this indictment? The gravamen of this charge is fraud; the germ of the complaint is imitation. There is no escape by showing that the imitation is successful, and that it is a good article. That only shows the strength of our case. It would not be dangerous if it were not good. But we stand upon the proposition, which I have before enunciated, that when we have built up a good will for a trade product no adventurer may come in and dispossess us of our trade, purloin our profits, and then justify himself by saying, "Oh, my product is just as good as yours and just as palatable." That is no answer under the trade-mark law; it is no answer in equity; it is no answer in justice.

"Well," it is said, "it is chemically as pure as butter." Mr. President, what is it to be chemically pure? This all rests on the testimony of the chemist. The chemist is the Mephistopheles of modern society. He has headquarters in every distillery, and by his necromancy in an hour's time converts raw spirits into 10-year-old whisky. By a change of ingredients and a turn of the wrist high wine directly from the still is converted into old Holland gin. The poor fool, whose vitals are being eaten out by the decoction, smacks his lips when he drinks it and fancies he detects the mellifluous flavor of age. [Laughter.] The chemist is particeps criminis in every one of our food adulterations. He is a very jolly man; he stands back at a safe distance and sees the public fleeced according to his own machinations; he has an oleaginous face and wears a smile that would grease a wagon. [Laughter.] As has been suggested here, it would be cold comfort for the individual whose vitals had been eaten out by this chemical dose to receive the assurance of the chemist that the stuff was chemically pure.

Mr. President, with the art which the chemist commands he can take oil that is rendered from the disease-infected carcass of a horse and in a few minutes he will present it to you in the test tube chemically pure. There is none of the sediment of decay in it, because it has been deodorized by chemicals. There is no taste that indicates decomposition, because powerful agents have been applied; it has just been divorced from death and disease, but there is no human sense that can detect its revolting history. Do you yearn for that as an appetizing morsel upon the assurance of the chemist that it is chemically pure? Probably there has been no field open to the chemist which has been more remunerative or successful than in giving oleomargarine the semblance of butter.

I do not doubt that there are butterine factories that are cleanly, but we all understand that oleo oil is a separate trade product, sold ready-made in the market. Who made that oleo oil or from what substance it was extracted no man can tell, but the imagination can easily suggest.

It is said that butter is guilty of the same deception of which it complains, and my friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]—and I am sorry he is not here—is inclined to think that the coloring of butter is as much a transgression as the coloring of oleomargarine. That is really the old, old trick of the criminal lawyer to put the prosecution on trial and create a diversion for the time being. But let us see whether butter is equally guilty.

We have spoken earlier of the title the dairyman has in equity and justice to the color, to the grain, and to the flavor. It is well known that every manufacturer, no matter in what line, is anxious to present to the market a uniform product, and for that purpose, and not for the purpose of deception, it has been customary for very many years for the butter makers to resort to various expedients in feeding stock and in the use of color to bring the winter butter nearer to the standard of the color of the butter of June. Is there a human being who has ever been deceived by that? Has butter ever imposed upon anyone by virtue of its color? Has it ever been sold for anything but butter or assumed to be anything else than butter?

The distinction is this, that the coloring that is put in butter in January is reaching back to June and trying to perpetuate a color that belongs to butter, that distinctively and exclusively belongs to it. It is not a scheme to counterfeit something else or to mislead the trade. I am reminded, sir, that the woman of fashion sometimes employs cosmetics. She is seeking to perpetuate in her cheeks the roses that used to bloom there; she is struggling to reproduce charms that were hers in the earlier years. It is another case of January reaching back to June. It is true that in her case she probably fools nobody but herself. [Laughter.] The distinction is that while butter is trying to preserve and perpetuate its own color throughout the twelve months of the year and make it uniform, a color that is recognized as belonging to it and to no other product, oleomargarine, on the other hand, is using the color of butter as a mask to enable it to sneak into the market and deprive this genuine article of its trade and profit. The distinction is apparent and elementary. Before the great inquest of public opinion the indictment of the genuine article can not be found "a true bill."

So stealthy has been the advance of this counterfeit that never yet in any trade circular or newspaper has there been a market quotation of either butterine or oleomargarine. For twenty years it has been insidiously taking possession of the market of butter; but so far as the great trade circulars are concerned, and the market quotations, where every article of merchandise is scheduled, there has not been to this day a suggestion that there was such an article of merchandise as butterine or oleomargarine. Stealthily, like a serpent, it has crept into this market; it has thrown its coils around a great, honest industry, and when the dairymen cried out from sheer distress it raised its scaly head and darted out its dark tongue, and said: "Don't step on me; I am an honest industry."

For a moment, Mr. President, I want to speak of another very persuasive argument which has been made by the opponents of this bill. It is asserted that this bill is intended to crush one industry for the benefit of another. A most pathetic chorus has been chanted upon that key. The cattlemen and the cotton-seed men have all joined in, and I fancy that the chemist has been moved to tears by the doleful strains. This tale of woe need deceive no one. In the first place, this bill does not attack oleomargarine except when it is fraudulent. In the next place, sir, if I have shown that originally this conspiracy against this market amounted to commercial rascality, by what necromancy has it been converted into a righteous enterprise? The proposition involves moral obliquity that does no credit to its advocates. The assumption of the argument is that colored oleomargarine is entitled to the same consideration and the same treatment as colored butter. I say, Mr. President, that that argument falls to the ground. Wealth can not make fraud decent. By its enormous profits oleomargarine has become great, and it impudently assumes to have become good. Age will not lend fraud respectability. Its great success is simply evidence of its slippery skill and nothing more.

What is called here "an honest industry that is liable to be crushed out" has been denounced by the legislatures of 32 States as an outlaw and a base fraud. Any argument that is built up upon the proposition that that fraud is entitled to the same consideration as the genuine article and the honest trade is not entitled to be considered in this place.

We do not assail cheap butter or patent butter or oleomargarine. We demand that it shall be honest with the trade. This bill denies to oleomargarine nothing that oleomargarine has a right to demand. Instead of taxing it out of existence, we insist that it shall have an existence—an independent existence of its own. All we ask is to tax the fraud out of it so that it shall no longer thrive as a parasite. If it still persist in counterfeiting butter, we propose to reduce the commercial incentive and compel it to pay a tax of 10 cents a pound, and thus equalize the cost of production.

I should ill represent the breadth of mind and the fairness of my constituents if I stood here opposing a wholesome substitute for butter. I will not do that. There is room for both products in the market if they can be honestly manufactured and honestly sold. If the lumbermen think, as many of them do, that oleomargarine is better for the purposes of the camp, that it lasts longer, and is more easily transported, let them have it by all means; but let us have the market honestly conducted; what is sold for butter, let it be butter, and what is sold for oleomargarine, let it be understood as such. Then the poor man will need no protection such as our friends on the other side of this Chamber have assumed to throw around him. Destroy the fraud in the market and the poor man will take care of himself. He knows what he wants; he knows whether he wants butter or oleomargarine, and if the market can be honestly administered he will need no protection at our hands.

The most prominent, if not the most persuasive, feature of the testimony offered by the opponents of this bill before the committee is that sales of oleomargarine must be abandoned unless it is permitted to simulate butter. This is an appeal for letters of marque and reprisal against a legitimate market—a sinister argument in favor of fraud. Such an appeal is not fit to be considered, much less countenanced, here. The insincerity of the opposition becomes apparent in view of the fact that no honest effort has been made to sell oleomargarine as oleomargarine. They have not tried the experiment of honesty. This appears from the literature of the trade on the subject.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] yesterday called attention to the card of William J. Moxley, which I have here, calling attention to the differences in color in winter, in summer, in different localities. I also have a little card that is sent out in connection with that publication which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. You will notice that on the outside the Stars and Stripes are printed, as though that fraud might nestle under its graceful folds, and it says "Stand by your colors."

Here [exhibiting] are the colors that are the badge of this fraud. There is the Wisconsin color [indicating]; the Denver color [indicating]. No. 6 is a straw color; No. 5 is the Cincinnati color; and now notice: "No. 4 is for country roll," suggesting the despicable fraud that was so justly characterized by the distinguished Senator from Iowa in his eloquent address on yesterday. There is a separate color for the man who can cherish in his heart so mean a fraud as that, making this counterfeit butter up into those little unequal rolls, just as the poor old country woman was in the habit of doing, and putting the basket in the hands of a man disguised as a farmer to go about and impose upon poor people. In order that such a fraud may be successfully perpetrated, here is the color of your "country roll."

By these notices the trade is informed that the varying shade of butter from month to month has been carefully imitated, and that the manufacturer is prepared to produce just what is wanted at all seasons to make the counterfeit complete. In another circular this same man Moxley advises the trade—

Your profit will be double the amount made from the butter you are now handling, and your butter trade will be more satisfied if you will send them such butterine as you can buy from me.

Then I have here a card from Braun & Fitts, who are among the leading producers of this bogus article:

Now is your chance to build up a first-class trade by handling only first-class butterine. Eggs are selling at cost, but The only High Grade—

That is the brand—

will give you profit; so keep pushing its sale and build up a reputation for good butter.

That is the gospel of this trade—push butterine, and so build up a reputation for good butter.

Here I see on the next page the card of one of the manufacturers of patent butter—the Capital City Dairy Company. Why "dairy," Mr. President? Their product has never seen a dairy. They draw on the shambles for their material. This only indicates that the trail of the serpent is over it all. Oleomargarine seems to be a diaphanous compound. It seems to induce a fraud as naturally as snuff induces a sneeze. As an old judge in the early days of our State once said while charging a jury in a fraud case, "Gentlemen, 'f-r-o-a-d' [fraud] is wrote all over it from one end to the other."

Everybody who deals in the slippery stuff is involved in a strong temptation to deceive, but by one of the clauses of this bill it would appear that the oleo eater has reserved the right to fool himself. He will tell you that oleo is cleaner and more wholesome and quite as palatable; that butter is much of it vile stuff, and still he wants his oleo colored to resemble butter. He knows it is oleo, but it stimulates his pride to say, "Mary, pass the butter." Therefore, in recognition of this inevitable crooked tendency, this bill recognizes the right of the consumer to color his own oleomargarine for family use and to indulge a harmless delusion.

I wish to call attention to another card which is issued by one of the strongest combines engaged in this business—that is Swift & Co.; Swift & Co., a firm known all over the world. What do they say? And, by the way, this card was sent to every member of Congress and every Senator, and see what an audacious thing it is:

The question of color is urged against the use of oleomargarine. It goes without saying—

Note the language—

It goes without saying—

That is, it is too plain to require explanation—

It goes without saying that we have the right to make our goods as attractive and as pleasing to the eye and as desirable to the purchaser as we can.

That is almost the exact language of my distinguished friend, the Senator from Mississippi, and whether Swift & Co. got the language from him or whether he borrowed it from them I do not know. They discuss this coloring matter, but I will not weary the Senate by reading it. The gist of it is that it goes without saying that they have the right to employ the butter color in their oleomargarine.

Now, who is Swift & Co.? It is an Illinois concern, presumably a corporation, created by the laws of Illinois and protected by the police power of that State. What was the law of Illinois at that time?

Imitation butter is defined as any article not produced from pure milk or cream—salt, rennet, and coloring matter excepted—in semblance of butter and designed to be used as a substitute for it. Shall not be colored to resemble butter.

The creature has become greater than the creator, State laws are trampled under foot, and this corporation says that it goes without saying that it may defy the law of Illinois. Not only so, but 31 other States of this Union have passed substantially the same law, and therefore this great combine have the audacity to say to you and to me by their card that it goes without saying that they have the right to do what? To violate the laws of 32 sovereign States of this Union.

Whence comes that power and what is the source of that undoubted prerogative? I can only think that it rests upon the brutal power of money or the dark sorcery of the trust. Swift & Co. Who are they? One of the Big 4, as we know them out West—trade despots, great enough to have thrown a shadow over every farm in the Northwest. Thousands of men trained as butchers have been obliged to abandon their calling because, forsooth, "it goes without saying" that this combine would have ground them to powder. In no State of the West dare one of these men kill a calf or a sheep for his own market. Why? Because "it goes without saying" that the combine would destroy him if he dared to do it.

Yet, Mr. President, the arrogance of that pretension is defended on the other side of this Chamber. There used to be an idea among the masses of the Democratic party throughout the country that the champions of the poor men, "the plain men," if you please, sat on the other side of this Chamber, but the debate on the oleomargarine bill will go a great ways to dispel that ancient superstition.

Mr. President, what have these men done? They have not only induced every retail dealer in oleomargarine to trample the law under his feet, but they have been powerful enough, as it now develops from the testimony taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to constrain the railroads of this country to violate the law in order that their own illicit profits might be increased. Still our friends on the other side, when we attack this fraud, bring in the Constitution of the United States and say, "Oh, give it a chance; give it a chance." They are practically holding the poor men of this country where they may be fleeced by these combinations, while at the same time they are uttering unctuous prayers for the welfare of the laboring men.

But, Mr. President, there is one thing that does "go without saying," and that is that these great combines are not willing to try conclusions with the Federal power, and therefore they oppose the passage of this bill. For that very reason, sir, we ought to pass the bill. I believe that Uncle Sam, with his own strong arm, ought to push these trade giants over on to their own ground and give the American dairyman a chance. Let us declare that henceforth the markets shall be honestly conducted; that what is sold for butter shall be butter, and that if oleomargarine shall sneak into the market under the disguise of butter it shall hereafter pay a tribute of 10 cents a pound. Otherwise, it shall stand on its own merits content with its own profits. If this measure shall accomplish these results, no Senator on this floor will have occasion to regret his vote in favor of this bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 1256) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Stephen A. Toops.

RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the Congress timely consideration of measures for maintaining diplomatic and consular representatives in Cuba and for carrying out the provisions of the act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, approved March 2, 1901, reading as follows:

"Provided further, That in fulfillment of the declaration contained in the joint resolution approved April 20, 1898, entitled 'For the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect,' the President is hereby authorized to 'leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people' so soon as a government shall have been established in said island under a constitution which, either as a part thereof or in an ordinance appended thereto, shall define the future relations of the United States with Cuba substantially as follows:

"I.

"That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain, by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

"II.

"That said government shall not assume or contract any public debt to pay the interest upon which, and to make reasonable sinking fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which, the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of government, shall be inadequate.

"III.

"That the government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the government of Cuba.

"IV.

"That all acts of the United States in Cuba during its military occupancy thereof are ratified and validated, and all lawful rights acquired thereunder shall be maintained and protected.

"V.

"That the government of Cuba will execute, and as far as necessary extend, the plans already devised or other plans to be mutually agreed upon, for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the commerce of the southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein.

"VI.

"That the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title thereto being left to future adjustment by treaty.

"VII.

"That to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba, and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defense, the government of Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

"VIII.

"That by way of further assurance the government of Cuba will embody the foregoing provisions in a permanent treaty with the United States."

The people of Cuba having framed a constitution embracing the foregoing requirements, and having elected a president who is soon to take office, the time is near for the fulfillment of the pledge of the United States to leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people. I am advised by the Secretary of War that it is now expected that the installation of the government of Cuba and the termination of the military occupation of that island by the United States will take place on the 20th of May next.

It is necessary and appropriate that the establishment of international relations with the government of Cuba should coincide with its inauguration, as well to provide a channel for the conduct of diplomatic relations with the new State as to open the path for the immediate negotiation of conventional agreements to carry out the provisions of the act above quoted.

It is also advisable that consular representation be established without delay at the principal Cuban ports in order that commerce with the island may be conducted with due regard to the formalities prescribed by the revenue and navigation statutes of the United States, and that American citizens in Cuba may have the customary local resorts open to them for their business needs and, the case arising, for the protection of their rights.

I therefore recommend that provision be forthwith made, and the salaries appropriated, to be immediately available, for—

a. Envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Republic of Cuba.....	$10,000
b. Secretary of legation.....	2,000
c. Second secretary of legation.....	1,500
d. Consul-general at Habana.....	5,000
e. Consuls at—
Cienfuegos.....	3,000
Santiago de Cuba.....	3,000

I do not recommend the present restoration of the consulates formerly maintained at Baracoa, Cardenas, Matanzas, Nuevitas, Sagua la Grande, and San Juan de los Remedios. The commercial interests at those ports heretofore have not been large. The consular fees collected there during the fiscal year 1896-97 aggregated $752.10. It is believed that the actual needs of the six offices named can be efficiently subserved by agents under the three principal consular offices until events may show the necessity of erecting a full consulate at any point.

The commercial and political conditions in the island of Cuba while under the Spanish Crown afford little basis for estimating the local development of intercourse with this country under the influence of the new relations which have been created by the achievement of Cuban independence, and which are to be broadened and strengthened in every proper way by conventional pacts with the Cubans and by wise and beneficent legislation aiming to stimulate the commerce between the two countries, if the great task we accepted in 1898 is to be fittingly accomplished.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 27, 1902.

CAPTURE OF AGUINALDO.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, on opening the papers this morning we were confronted with an Associated Press dispatch from Topeka, Kans., which I desire to read. The headlines are as follows:

FUNSTON DENOUNCES PRESS—EASTERN CRITICISM OF LOTUS CLUB SPEECH MAKES THE GENERAL TIRED.

The following is the dispatch:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 26, 1902.

Gen. Frederick Funston was in this city to-day, on his way to California. General Funston delivered himself of a denunciation of the Eastern newspapers which criticised his speech before the Lotus Club in New York. He said:

"I have been nagged by that class of papers until I am tired. Editorially they willfully misinterpret my remarks, and I am glad to express my independence of their opinions and their talk and that of their kind about my using dishonorable and unfair means in the capture of Aguinaldo; also that I violated the Articles of War. They know a great deal more about the articles of golf than they do about the Articles of War. Everything is permissible in a campaign except the use of poison or the violation of a flag of truce.

"As a matter of fact, only four of my men on the expedition were dressed in the insurgent uniform. The others were dressed as Filipino peasants.

"President Roosevelt approved heartily of my remarks before the Lotus Club banquet and was very anxious to have me go to Boston on the invitation of Senator LODGE and make the same speech there, but my orders were such that it was impossible for me to go."

Mr. President, I paid no attention to the speech of General Funston before the Lotus Club, although it indulged in pretty broad suggestions that those in the United States who were engaged in seeking to have justice done to the Filipinos and to satisfy the people that the Philippine Archipelago was undesirable property for the United States deserved hanging more than those actually engaged in the insurrection. I do not intend to criticize General Funston nor to denounce him in any way, and I would not notice the matter now were it not for the fact that he seeks to buttress himself behind President Roosevelt and the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Philippines.

As it is quite evident, if he is correctly reported, that he is likely to be used in the future for campaign purposes, making practically the same speech, with the approval of distinguished officials of the nation, that he made before the Lotus Club, I think it but just and proper that two things should be put before the country in a calm and dispassionate manner. First, the statement of General Funston himself, over his own signature only last September, about the capture of Aguinaldo; and, second, the rules of civilized warfare as promulgated, with the approval of President Lincoln, and as declared by all writers upon international law, and as ratified by the late peace conference at The Hague.

Without indulging in criticism, I will first call attention to the rules of war applicable to the conduct of General Funston in dealing with Aguinaldo. I read from page 223 of George B. Davis's International Law. The author was an instructor at West Point, and he gives the rules which should govern warfare upon the part of a civilized nation, as he derives them from all the great authorities upon that very important subject. On page 222, section 21, under the subhead "Use of the enemy's uniform and flag," he makes the following statement:

It is forbidden in war on land to make use of the enemy's flag for purposes of deceit. It is also forbidden to use the enemy's uniform except with some distinguishing mark sufficiently striking in character to attract attention at a distance. On the sea the national flag of a public armed vessel must be displayed before an engagement begins or a capture is made. These rules are based on the fact that flags and uniforms are used for the purpose of determining the national character of troops in the field. A violation of these rules indicates a want of good faith, a quality equally obligatory in peace and war.

Turning to the late work of Mr. Frederick W. Holls, who was a member of The Hague conference, representing the United States, I read as follows from pages 150 and 151:

The idea of codifying the laws of war in their entirety originated with the late Francis Lieber, professor of political science and international law at Columbia University, New York. He was also the author of the code approved by President Lincoln and formulated in 1863 as General Orders, No. 100, for the government of the United States armies in the field by General Halleck. This order, as was said by M. de Martens at The Hague, has remained the basis of all subsequent efforts in the direction of humanization of war.

I turn to that general order, which received the approval of President Lincoln, and was issued for the government of the American armies in the field, and has remained the guide for American armies—both of privates and officers—and call attention to the following sections on page 411:

63. Troops who fight in the uniform of their enemies, without any plain, striking, and uniform mark of distinction of their own, can expect no quarter.

65. The use of the enemy's national standard, flag, or other emblem of nationality for the purpose of deceiving the enemy in battle is an act of perfidy by which they lose all claim to the protection of the laws of war.

Then I turn to section 101 of this order, which reads as follows:

101. While deception in war is admitted as a just and necessary means of hostility, and is consistent with honorable warfare, the common law of war allows even capital punishment for clandestine or treacherous attempts to injure an enemy, because they are so dangerous and it is so difficult to guard against them.

Recurring again to the work of Mr. Holls, page 151, in which, as I have already read, he says the order approved by President Lincoln has remained the basis of all subsequent efforts in the direction of the humanization of war, I read from it the following in The Hague treaty, which treaty was ratified by the Senate only the other day:

ART. 22. The right of belligerents to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited.

It then recites things which are prohibited, and says:

ART. 23. Besides the prohibitions provided by special conventions, it is especially prohibited—

(a) To employ poison or poisoned arms.
(b) To treacherously kill or wound individuals belonging to the hostile nation or army.

Then following down to "f.":

(f) To make improper use of a flag of truce, the national flag, or military ensigns, and the enemy's uniform, as well as the distinctive badges of the Geneva convention.

So we discover that following the precedents which were established by the United States forty years ago and approved by President Lincoln, The Hague conference classes with the employment of poison or poisoned arms and to treacherously kill or wound individuals, the following:

To make improper use of a flag of truce, the national flag, or military ensigns, and the enemy's uniform, as well as the distinctive badges of the Geneva convention.

I now read from Halleck on International Law, pages 400 and 401, a part of section 20 and a part of section 21:

SEC. 20. The same may be said of assassination, or treacherously taking the life of an enemy. Not unfrequently the success of a campaign, or even the termination of the war, depends upon the life of the sovereign or of the commanding general. Hence, in former times it sometimes happened that a resolute person was induced to steal into the enemy's camp, under the cover of a disguise, and, having penetrated to the general's quarters, to surprise and kill him. Such an act is now deemed infamous and execrable, both in him who executes and in him who commands, encourages, or rewards it.

Quoting from section 21:

But we must distinguish between a treacherous murder and a surprise, which is always allowable in war. A small force, under cover of the night, may pass the enemy's lines, penetrate to his headquarters, surprise the general, and take him prisoner or attack and kill him. It was his duty to guard against such attacks, and to prevent a surprise. Such acts are, therefore, not only justifiable, but commendable; it is the disguise and treachery which gives to the deed the character of murder or assassination.

So that, beyond any doubt, if persons in the Federal uniform by any sort of subterfuge had gained access to the quarters of Aguinaldo and carried him off or killed him, if it were necessary, they would not act in violation of the articles of war, but where they succeed in doing this by disguise, by the assumption of the enemy's flag, or of his uniform, it is denounced, and if the result is the killing of an enemy under such circumstances it is declared to be assassination or murder.

Now, Mr. President, having in view those statements, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to General Funston's own rehearsal of this transaction. I call nobody else as a witness. I shall not attempt to give color to his statements, but will content myself with reading to the Senate his own plain, simple, almost naive and childish statement of that affair.

Turning to Everybody's Magazine, which I understand is owned and published by John Wanamaker, we find two articles, one in the September and the other in the October number, 1901, which is the story continued from one into the other, by General Funston, over his own signature, of his capture of Aguinaldo.

If the Senate will bear with me, I will, in as succinct a manner as I can, give General Funston's statement about that transaction.

Commencing at the beginning, it seems that about February, 1901, Company C of the Twenty-fourth United States Infantry was located at Pantabangan, upon the northeast part of the island of Luzon. Its commander, Lieutenant Taylor, was informed by the mayor of Pantabangan that a small number of insurgents were in the neighborhood, and that they could probably be induced to come in and be of service to the American side. The result was that they were induced to come in. The body was found to consist of Cecilio Segismundo, a confidential agent of Emilio Aguinaldo, and was the bearer of important dispatches to the insurgent generals in southern and central Luzon. The others were merely insurgent soldiers who acted as an escort for the messenger.

Lieutenant Taylor communicated with General Funston, the result being that he was directed to have Segismundo and the papers in his possession sent as rapidly as possible to headquarters. Upon an examination of the correspondence that Segismundo carried, it was found to consist of letters from Aguinaldo to his cousin, Baldomero Aguinaldo, and to Lacuna Sandico, Pablo and Simon Tecson, and to several subordinate chiefs. It directed that Baldomero Aguinaldo should be given an advanced command, and further asked that 400 of the best insurrectionary soldiers be sent to him at his then headquarters. General Funston states:

We kept Cecilio Segismundo at the headquarters, and I had several long talks with him, in which I finally got all the necessary information regarding the town of Palanan and the number of people with Aguinaldo. After much persuasion he agreed to assist in the capture of his former chief.

In other words, after much persuasion Cecilio Segismundo, the confidential agent of Emilio Aguinaldo, was induced to betray his superior and enter into an agreement to capture the chief he was professing to serve.

General Funston then describes the manner in which they reached the plan by which Aguinaldo was to be captured, and I read it. It is not very long. The latter part of it is the important feature.

The plan which I first suggested was a secret landing from a ship at night in the vicinity of the town and a quick march to effect a surprise. This, he said, was impossible, as the savage Balugas, who are very numerous throughout that region, would without doubt discover the landing and give the alarm, as they were well disposed toward the insurgents, who had poisoned their minds against the Americans by all sorts of ridiculous stories. A march from the valley of the Cagayan to the westward of Palanan would be wasted effort, as there was but one trail over the mountains, a distance of 50 miles, and that was very carefully guarded by outposts. Aguinaldo would receive ample warning of any expedition from that direction to enable him to get out of the way. When I proposed the plan that finally succeeded, the man clasped his hands together, jumped from his chair in great glee, and said it would probably succeed. The plan—

Now, mark the plan, and bear in mind the rules that govern civilized warfare while the plan that Funston himself unfolds is being considered. He says:

The plan was to disguise a body of native troops in our service as insurgent soldiers representing the reinforcements asked for by Aguinaldo, and thus gain access to his presence. The necessary American officers were to be carried along as supposed prisoners who had been captured en route. Any suspicious Aguinaldo might have were to be lulled by decoy letters over the forged signature of some insurgent chief. The whole plan will be best understood by a perusal of the following letter to my immediate superior, General Wheaton—

Then follows the letter in which the plan is substantially stated as I have read it. I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate in reading it, and I ask that it may be published with my remarks.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

SAN ISIDRO, PROVINCE OF NUEVA ECILJA,

February 12, 1901.

THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL,

Department of Northern Luzon, Manila, P. I.

SIR: I have the honor to suggest the following plan for the capture of Aguinaldo, who, from recent developments, is known to certainly be at Palanan, province of Isabela.

Before stating the plan I wish to call attention to the following facts, gleaned partly from the captured letters and partly from the native Cecilio Segismundo, who brought through the correspondence. Aguinaldo has in these letters ordered Simon Tecson, Sandico, and Baldomero Aguinaldo to send him troops as soon as possible, this man to act as guide for one of the detachments. The man himself corroborates this by stating that Aguinaldo gave him verbal instructions to guide back to Palanan the first one of the columns to come through. Aguinaldo will consequently be expecting the column guided by this man.

My plan is to take a company of Macabebes to Manila, arm them with Mausers and Remingtons, dress them partly in insurgent uniforms and partly in the clothing of the country, take one of the Navy light-draft gunboats, and be landed at night on the east coast of Luzon, south of Casiguran. Four or five officers would be with them, carried along as supposed prisoners, until the time came for action. I would take Natividad and several other ex-insurgent officers, who would act as officers of the column until the time came to throw off the disguise. Upon arrival at Casiguran, which we would do by marching along the beach, we would call on the presidente, an insurgent, to supply us with necessities (this man facilitated Segismundo), and would send forward a letter signed by Natividad that we were reinforcements from Nueva Ecija, coming in obedience to his orders.

I believe that we could deceive him until we were in his presence, and the rest would be easy. Up to this time the American officers would be prisoners, nominally. It is not likely that Aguinaldo knows that Natividad has presented himself, but still considers him in his service.

The native Segismundo is more than willing to play his part. All details can be worked out satisfactorily, and the plan ought to succeed, though there is no doubt great hardships will be endured. It should be done before Aguinaldo learns that his courier has presented himself and given up the letters. It would be necessary to pay the Tagalos who go as supposed officers pretty liberally, of course contingent on success. If the plan is approved may I be notified by wire, in order to make preparations?

Respectfully,

FREDERICK FUNSTON,
Brigadier-General, United States Volunteers.

Mr. PATTERSON. General Funston then proceeds with his account, as follows:

The reply to the above communication was a telegram instructing me to come to Manila at once for consultation with the department commander, General Wheaton. The latter approved the plan without hesitation, and directed me to report to the division commander, General MacArthur, etc.

Now, I pass from that to the preparations that were made as described by General Funston and the methods of disguise resorted to. General Funston's memory is bad when he states there were but four of the Macabebes dressed as Filipinos, as I shall show. There were 20, at least. Under the subhead "Preliminaries arranged in secret," General Funston recites:

Once in Manila I was kept busy making the preliminary arrangements for the expedition. I was given practically carte blanche by my superiors, and assisted in every manner possible. The company of Macabebes was immediately brought from its station at Pulilan, Bulacan, to Caloocan, a suburb of Manila. The first task was to make these men look as much as possible like a band of insurgent soldiers. It would have been very unwise to put them all in insurgent uniforms, for since the insurrection had degenerated into guerrilla warfare the great majority of the enemy's soldiers have been dressed in the clothing of the country, so that they could be combatants or noncombatants without the necessity of undergoing any more transformation than concealing their rifles in a clump of bamboo.

To have equipped our men throughout with uniforms would have aroused suspicion because of their neatness and uniformity. Accordingly we procured only 20 uniforms of the blue and white striped cotton cloth with which the insurgents were formerly clothed, the remainder being outfitted as Filipino paisanos or peasants. Fifty Mauser and 18 Remington rifles were obtained from the stock of captured arms in the Manila arsenal. There were 100 cartridges for each Mauser and 80 for each Remington.

Those were his preparations. Since I can not read it all, I turn to the following paragraphs:

The Macabebes—

And these were native soldiers who were to assume the rôle of insurrectos and by their uniform to deceive the insurrecto general—

The Macabebes went on board wearing their uniforms as American soldiers, and did not receive their insurgent equipment until after the vessel had sailed. On March 6 we embarked, and after dark the same day the little white gunboat slipped out of Manila Bay to the southward, en route to the east coast into the Straits of San Bernardino.

It became necessary, in addition to dressing 20 Macabebes as insurrectos and the rest as peasants, in order that the disguise might be the more complete and less likely of discovery, to forge some letters. A little while before they had captured the baggage of a Filipino general named Lacuna. General Funston, referring to that, says:

During the six days' voyage from Manila the decoy letters which were to play so prominent a part were prepared. On the 24th day of October, 1900, while scouting with a small detachment of cavalry in the southern part of Nueva Ecija, I had surprised and nearly captured the insurgent general, Lacuna, obtaining, however, his personal effects, stationery, correspondence, etc. Among this material were several sheets of writing paper, the top of each one being already stamped with his official seal. From captured correspondence we were perfectly familiar with Lacuna's signature, and before leaving San Isidro I had had a Filipino very expert with the pen imitate Lacuna's autograph at the foot of two of these sheets of paper.

Then he tells how afterwards at sea they filled in the blank pages above Lacuna's forged autograph. They give a translation of the two forged letters addressed by the fictitious Lacuna to Aguinaldo, one of which simply contained general information as to the progress of the insurrection and the other related to the troops that Lacuna was ostensibly sending to Aguinaldo in response to his request to send him 400 Filipinos. I will not read it all, but it recites that he is unable to send 400; that he sends somewhere in the neighborhood of 100, and that they are under the command of one Hilario Placido, an ex-mayor, "whom you no doubt remember through his former service."

Thus equipped with disguised Macabebes and with forged letters intended to deceive Aguinaldo and to cause him to believe that the company that was approaching were his own troops and his own officers, we came to the statement of General Funston as to his entrance into Casiguran on his way to Aguinaldo. The subhead under which this part of the story is printed reads "Entrance into Casiguran under false colors."

Just as darkness was coming on, worn and weary by our march of 20 miles, we entered the dilapidated town and were met by the alcalde and principal citizens. The first Americans ever seen by the inhabitants of this isolated village were regarded with mild curiosity. A few scowled at us, but the majority appeared by no means unfriendly. Our people—

That is, the Macabebes—hugely enjoyed the joke, and it was with difficulty that the Macabebes kept serious faces. Apparently no one suspected our identity. The Macabebes had been cautioned against conversing in their own language lest suspicion be aroused, and used the Tagalog dialect exclusively.

While at Casiguran General Funston caused a third letter to be forged, purporting to be signed by Hilario Placido, addressed to Aguinaldo, in which the insurgent general was notified of their approach and of the difficulties of their trip and of the additional fact that—

While on the march through the mountains near Pantabangan we came face to face with a detachment of American soldiers making maps, and by the suddenness of our attack and by surrounding them we were able after slight resistance to take five prisoners.

The five prisoners were the five American officers who accompanied the Macabebes, all under the command of General Funston. They were carried along, after this letter was forwarded to Aguinaldo, as captured American soldiers by this supposed band of Filipino insurgents.

That ends the story as told in the September number of the magazine. I now come to its conclusion in the October number. Here is the account of the journey from Casiguran to Aguinaldo's headquarters. They were compelled to make detours, the footpaths being fearfully steep, so they were compelled to use not only their feet, but their hands, and they could not have surmounted the difficulties if it had not been for the roots and branches of the trees, which gave them something to hold to. The account says:

Every morning at daybreak we took up the march without breakfast, and kept at it until 10 o'clock, when we boiled some cracked corn, which we ate; rested two or three hours, and resumed the march until dark, when we would prepare another meal and lie down to sleep. We had but two meals a day, and these were short rations. Rain poured in torrents nearly all the time, day and night, and there was not one who had on his person a stitch of dry clothing at any time between Casiguran and Palanan. It is difficult to estimate how many streams we waded. Some were deep, swift, and dangerous, others trivial. We had three days' ration, but made it last five. The Macabebes caught small fish in their hands, and we got limpets, snails, and a small devilfish, which we stewed, etc.

All of the sixth day out from Casiguran we plodded along weak and hungry, without a mouthful of food. Our situation could not be regarded in any other light than serious. It was a day, too, of misgivings. Why had no messenger been sent out from Palanan to meet us?

He means in response to the forged letters that had been forwarded to Aguinaldo.

Had someone been a traitor and sold us? During all the afternoon of that day we half expected a blast of rifle fire from every cliff we passed under.

Omitting some immaterial portions—immaterial for my purpose—he tells how he addressed a forged letter, ostensibly signed by Hilario Placido, to Aguinaldo telling him of the straits in which they were for food, and begging that food be sent them. General Funston, as to that, says:

In the meantime we must have food before resuming the march in the morning. Accordingly, a letter was written in Tagalog and forwarded to Palanan at once by a Baluga furnished us by the old man.

Then follows the purported letter of Hilario Placido, lieutenant-colonel commanding, addressed, "To the colonel and chief of staff, Simeon Villa." Then the account continues:

The food came early the next morning, and after a hasty breakfast the march for Palanan—

That is where Aguinaldo was—was taken up by the main part of the company, we Americans being left behind with a guard of 10 Macabebes, under a corporal.

The company reached Palanan, and I take up the statement of General Funston as to what occurred there. He says:

But the end was now at hand. A few moments before 3 o'clock we reached the bank of the Palanan River, a stream about a hundred yards wide, and saw the last boat load of Macabebes forming on the farther bank. As prearranged the boat was sent back for us and we were just embarking when firing broke out in the town on the other bank. We hurried across and took command of the excited and yelling Macabebes, who were filling the air with bullets, firing in every direction. We Americans ran at once to Aguinaldo's house, and reached there just in time to take part in the last of the scrimmage and saved the lives of the prisoners from the Macabebes, who had recognized the unfortunate dictator and were chasing him about the room.

Aguinaldo, as might be expected, was terribly agitated, and, in fact, could scarcely speak. He said to me in Spanish, "Oh, tell me, is not this a joke?" I assured him that it was, to the contrary, cold, hard fact, and that he was at last a prisoner. He would scarcely believe it at first. Villa, shot through the hand and shoulder, was more self-contained. Santiago Barcelona, Aguinaldo's treasurer, a bright and well-educated mestizo, was excited, but glad to be alive. We assured the prisoners that no harm would come to them, and from that time treated them with every possible consideration.

Because of the unfortunate circumstance that compelled us Americans to be kept in the background at first, we had to hear from the others what had occurred while we were crossing the river. The column had been met at the river bank by a staff officer, and Segovia and Hilario taken up to report to Aguinaldo—

Those Macabebes and those in command of them were received as friends; they were dressed as friends, professing to be friends. By reason of an arrangement they had gone on a short time in advance of the five Americans who were of the party.

The column had been met at the river bank by a staff officer and Segovia and Hilario taken up to report to Aguinaldo, who, surrounded by eight officers, received them cordially, and plied them with questions regarding their long march, the capture of the Americans, and many other matters. It was the most trying situation for the two men, surrounded as they were by a number of men, every one of whom carried a revolver. The versatile Spaniard—

He was the one who had done the forging for General Funston—was put to his wits' end to answer all the questions successfully and keep up the conversation. In the meantime the Macabebes were crossing the river in the boat, eight at a time, and forming on the bank. All across, they were marched up to the plaza near Aguinaldo's house, not more than a hundred yards from the landing, and formed in line facing the 50 soldiers of Aguinaldo's escort, who were drawn up to receive them—

To receive them as friends—

At this moment Segovia, looking out of the window, saw the Americans approaching—

Segovia was the Spaniard who has been referred to, the instrument of Funston to forge the letters—and, excusing himself for a moment, stepped out of the house and told Gregorio Cadhit—

This was another of Funston's Macabebes—to open fire on the escort.

That was the escort of Aguinaldo.

Gregorio yelled out in Spanish, "Now is your time, Macabebes; give it to them." The Macabebes, terribly excited over the trying situation, fired first a few scattering shots and then a ragged volley. The men lined up near them broke in disorder and fled, firing a few shots in return, one of which wounded a Macabebe slightly. In their flight they threw away 18 rifles and a thousand rounds of ammunition. Only two of them were killed. When Segovia had given the order to Gregorio, he stepped back into the house.

At the first shots Aguinaldo, who did not suspect the situation, stepped to the window and said to his men:

"Stop that foolishness. Do not waste your ammunition."

He evidently thought the men were firing in the air to celebrate.

That is, to celebrate the arrival of these reenforcements, these new officers.

At this juncture Hilario threw his arms about Aguinaldo and bore him to the floor, saying: "You are a prisoner of the Americans." Segovia drew his revolver and shot Villa twice and Commandante Alhambra once. Both men threw themselves out of the window and into the deep and swift river, Alhambra disappearing entirely, so that his fate is still unknown. Villa was fished out by the Macabebes, who, with howls of delight, dragged him up the bank, a sorry-looking specimen. Of the officers in the room all escaped except Santiago Barcelona, the treasurer, who gave up quickly. At this moment we Americans entered the house, as already related.

It is unnecessary, Mr. President, to read more. I have done all that I intended to do. I simply desired to call the attention of the Senate to the rules of civilized warfare, as declared in the order that was approved by President Lincoln and as set forth by Halleck in his work upon international law, and that is stated by Holls as the basis of The Hague treaty, which the Senate ratified. All declare that the use of the enemy's uniform is perfidy, and that if in the use of such a killing occurs it is assassination, and those who engage in affairs of that character are, under the rules of civilized warfare, outside of protection.

It is true that Aguinaldo was not killed. It is true that General Funston and the Americans preserved Aguinaldo's life. In all human probability if Funston had not reached the headquarters of Aguinaldo at the time he did, the Macabebes and their officers would have succeeded in their efforts to kill Aguinaldo and his officers there with him. If that had occurred, what would it have been? If a general officer is responsible for those who are under him and operating under his command, he would have been responsible for whatever the crime was, and under the laws of war it is declared to be assassination.

I make this suggestion, however, that when Funston went on that expedition he took his life in his hands. It was an affair that required great personal courage, there is no doubt of that; but it was an expedition equipped and carried on in violation of the most sacred and most important rules of civilized warfare.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the rule the Senator read, so far as I recollect it, related to civilized and regular warfare.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not stated in the letter from which the Senator has read that, so far as the Filipinos are concerned, their war has degenerated into a guerrilla warfare? Did the Senator read the rule relating to guerrilla warfare?

Mr. PATTERSON. So has the warfare upon the part of the Boers in South Africa degenerated into guerrilla warfare. Guerrilla warfare is legitimate warfare. So all writers recognize. When Governor Taft testified before the Philippine Committee, he recognized the fact that guerrilla warfare is legitimate warfare.

Mr. SPOONER. I have turned down a page in the book from which the Senator read on guerrilla warfare.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no objection to the Senator reading it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care to do so now.

Mr. PATTERSON. But General Funston in this interview, as it is printed this morning, claims that he violated no rule of civilized warfare, that only the administration of poison or the violation of a flag of truce are in derogation of the rules of civilized warfare. He thereby undertakes to place his conduct in that transaction upon the plane of the rules of civilized warfare.

As I said before, it is not my purpose to denounce General Funston, but simply to state unquestioned facts as detailed by General Funston himself, and to read the rules applicable to civilized warfare as they have been recognized in this country for years, and by the civilized nations of the world, and as they have been adopted in the treaty composed by the conference at The Hague.

I was going to say that undoubtedly when General Funston went on that expedition—and I think I am doing him no injustice—he made up his mind to sell his life dearly if it became necessary to do so. If his plan had not been successful, if Aguinaldo had been prepared for his reception, and it had been necessary, without any hesitation whatever Aguinaldo would have been killed, as would everyone who was in his command and connected with his defense. Fortunately for Aguinaldo and, I think, fortunately for Funston, there was no necessity for that. But two of Aguinaldo's guards were killed. By the rules of war they were assassinated.

I want to suggest, therefore, whether General Funston was warranted in saying that the President approved his speech or not, and whether he was warranted in what he said about the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Philippines, and also whether or not, as he intimates, he may be used as a campaign orator in the coming campaign, the facts of his dealings with Aguinaldo, as detailed by himself, and the laws of civilized warfare as they are, without any question, should be put clearly and unequivocally before the American people.

I have done, Mr. President, all I intended to do, and, under the circumstances, I think I have done no less than I should do.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 171) for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by myself on the 28th of February, providing for additional rules for the government of debate in the Senate, to report it back, and I desire at this time, if there be no objection, to have the report read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report the following resolution: "Resolved, That Rule XIX be amended by inserting at the beginning of clause 2 thereof the following:

"No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words, impute to another Senator, or to other Senators, any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator."

"And further, by direction of the same committee, I give notice in writing of said proposed amendment to the second clause of the nineteenth rule, and that the purpose thereof is to make more clear the rule of the Senate requiring decorum in debate and the power and duty of the Chair to enforce the same."

GEO. F. HOAR,
For the Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the report to lie over or to be placed on the Calendar?

Mr. CULLOM. Let it lie over and be printed.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it will lie over and be printed. I shall not call it up for one week unless the chairman of the committee thinks it desirable to have it sooner considered.

Mr. SPOONER. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed and lie upon the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 7 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 31, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 27, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HULL obtained the floor and said: Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole—

PURCHASE OF DANISH WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I present the resolution which I hold in my hand and now send to the desk, and which I ask to have read, as it states the matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas one Walter Christmas, a subject of Denmark, who is now and who has been for several years a diplomatic agent and representative of the Government of Denmark, authorized and empowered to negotiate with the Government of the United States for the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, and who was also the agent of the United States for the purchase of said islands, has submitted a secret and confidential report to his own Government; and

Whereas the said Christmas, agent and representative as aforesaid, in his said report to his said Government, declares and sets forth, among other things, the fact that the Government of Denmark has contracted, agreed, and obligated itself to pay and turn over to him, the said Christmas, 10 per cent, or about $500,000, of the proceeds of the purchase money arising from the sale of said islands to the United States when the same shall have been paid by the United States to Denmark, for the express purpose, as has been declared and set forth by him in his said secret report to his Government, for the bribing of members of the United States Congress and other prominent citizens of this country and for subsidizing American newspapers, to the end that the pending treaty between the United States and Denmark for the sale of the islands by the latter to the former Government may be so consummated; and

Whereas it is also declared and expressly set forth in said secret report that if said purchase money shall be paid to Denmark by the United States the said sum of about $500,000 thereof will be immediately paid over to said Christmas, agent and representative of the aforesaid, by his Government in pursuance of the agreement and contract already referred to for the corrupt objects and purposes set forth; and

Whereas the treaty between the two said Governments for the sale of the West Indian Islands by Denmark to the United States is now pending, and its ratification has not been finally consummated by the two said Governments, and the purchase price for the islands has not been appropriated by Congress; Therefore

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a select committee of seven members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to examine into the truth of all the allegations and charges made by the said Walter Christmas, agent and representative as aforesaid, in his said secret and confidential report to the Danish Government as to the methods pursued and to be pursued by him and any of his assistants in the United States, and the contracts made or proposed to be made by him or other persons acting in any way for him, or as assistants to him, for the purpose of, or which in any manner has for their object the bribery of or the attempted bribery of members of the United States Congress or of the payment of any valuable consideration of any kind or character to them or to any of them to vote for or to assist in procuring the proposal, adoption, or ratification of the said treaty of sale of the said islands, as aforesaid. Said committee shall have power to subpoena and examine witnesses under oath and to send for records, papers, and all other evidence that may be necessary for a full and complete investigation of the subjects herein mentioned, and it shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and to have such printing and binding done as it shall deem necessary. The committee shall make a full report to the House of the result of its investigation at as early a date as is practicable. The expense of the investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that. The preamble recites that the information it contained in a secret report, or, in other words, the preamble itself recites the fact that there are no facts known to the author of it—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A little louder. I can not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. PAYNE. The preamble recites that this is based on a secret report, or, in other words, it states facts of a secret report. Now, it seems to me that contradicts itself; that there is no foundation to form a question of privilege upon such a report, and the second point is that that matter is not before the House of Representatives.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add to that that it is not such a question of privilege that would take me off the floor for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Upon the latter point the Chair is clear that it would take the gentleman from the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from New York, I hope I will be permitted to say that that resolution which I have introduced alleges that these charges have been made by a diplomatic agent of the Danish Government to his Government in a secret report. I desire to say that I have on my desk a copy of that secret report, and therefore the objection made by the gentleman is not tenable. It was a secret report when made, and is described as a secret report by me in the resolution; but I state upon my honor as a member of this House that I have what purports to be and what I believe, from the evidence which I have before me and which I propose now to offer to the Speaker and to the House and to the country, to be the report, less one page, made by this secret agent to the Danish Government.

Now, I say that, Mr. Speaker, with a full responsibility of the words. I state as a member of this House that I have the unmistakable evidences in my judgment that this report was made by Mr. Christmas, the agent of the Danish Government and a quasi, if not a real, agent of our own Government, to Denmark. Having the copy of the report which I purpose offering here as a part of my remarks and from which I now desire to read, it seems to me that the objection made by the gentleman from New York will not hold.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman when he examined the archives of the Government of Denmark to see this secret report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I have never been to Denmark and have never examined the archives of that Government, but that is not the only way in which we can get evidence of the genuineness of a report. I take it the gentleman has never examined any of the archives of the courts of Europe, and yet he must believe that reports that have been made there are genuine. It is not necessary that I should go to Denmark. I have the evidences, Mr. Speaker, and I desire now to submit some of those evidences to the Chair, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, this is a grave charge. I have not brought it here for the purpose of seeking a mere political advantage. Here is a charge made by an official of the Danish Government that he has $500,000, or will have, of the purchase money to be paid, and which has not yet been paid, by this Government, for the express purpose of bribing American Congressmen, and yet the gentleman from New York endeavors to interpose a technical objection. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have evidences to sustain me in the statement which I have made upon my honor, and which I believe to be true. Now, sir, I am content to have the Chair rule upon the statement as made, or I will submit cheerfully some of the evidences which I hold in my hand and which are in my possession as to the genuineness of this report. Mr. Speaker, shall I proceed with some of the evidences as to the genuineness of the report or the authenticity of the report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has covered that branch of the case by making the statement here upon his honor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I believe it, sir; but I would prefer to give some of the evidences in order that the gentleman may see that I am not exaggerating, that I am not straining my conscience at all in making that statement, because I think the evidences which I possess are conclusive of the fact, and that every gentleman on the floor of this House who hears these evidences will believe that the report is genuine.

Mr. Speaker, I state that it has been published largely in nearly all of the papers in Copenhagen. I have some of the Copenhagen papers here containing this report, or portions of it. I have had them translated. I have the translations from these papers, and I am ready to submit the original papers to any Danish scholar who may read them, and I will also submit and have published with my remarks these extracts from the Danish papers. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this is true—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the allegations are that the members of Congress have been corrupted and bribed; also the newspapers. With regard to the newspapers, the Chair thinks that is a matter which alone would be hardly within the jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That may be subject to the criticism made, I admit.

The SPEAKER. And the term "Congress" includes both House and Senate. The allegations are not so specific as to show whether any member of the House is included in the charge. In respect to this the Chair is very strongly of the opinion that that body must be the custodian of its own morals, and no specification is made here which directly affects the House, as the Chair remembers the resolution when read, although the general term would include both Houses. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; I am prepared on that. The resolution as I present it describes the persons to be bribed as "members of Congress." I am warranted in amending the resolution, if the Chair holds that it is necessary, so as to say that the charge includes members of this House; but, Mr. Speaker, that is unnecessary. If we, the representatives of the American people, are to appropriate the money, if this treaty has been procured by bribery of American Senators and members were not included, we would have a right to inquire as to the truth of these charges.

Therefore that objection is immaterial; but I would be warranted in amending the resolution so as to limit it alone to members of this House, if that is required, and the Chair should hold that it must be members of the House of Representatives who are charged and should exclude all charges as to Senators. And I am very clearly of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that inasmuch as the treaty has not been ratified, and inasmuch as the question must come here for an appropriation, that we have the right, as the representatives of the American people, to know whether or not that treaty has been procured by bribery, whether $500,000, or any portion of this money, when paid over to Denmark, is to be distributed in this country to members of either House of Congress in furthering this legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is pretty strongly of the opinion that this should be limited to the House. If the gentleman will make that amendment—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Very well, Mr. Speaker. In my resolution, where I use the word "Congress," I will insert "including members of the House of Representatives."

Mr. FLEMING. Including members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire that the resolution be sent to me in order that I may add the words "including members of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. That will be the proper form.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. All right; I will make that addition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope we may have order; but if gentlemen do not want to hear this it is immaterial to me.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have added, after the words "members of the United States Congress," the words "including members of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as amended in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas one Walter Christmas, a subject of Denmark, who is now and who has been for several years a diplomatic agent and representative of the Government of Denmark, authorized and empowered to negotiate with the Government of the United States for the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, and who was also the agent of the United States for the purchase of said islands, has submitted a secret and confidential report to his own Government; and

Whereas the said Christmas, agent and representative as aforesaid, in his said report to his said Government, declares and sets forth among other things the fact that the Government of Denmark has contracted, agreed, and obligated itself to pay and turn over to him, the said Christmas, 10 per cent, or about $500,000, of the proceeds of the purchase money arising from the sale of said islands to the United States when the same shall have been paid by the United States to Denmark for the express purpose, as has been declared and set forth by him in his said secret report to his Government, for the bribing of members of the United States Congress, including members of the House of Representatives, and other prominent citizens of this country, and for subsidizing American newspapers, to the end that the pending treaty between the United States and Denmark for the sale of the islands by the latter to the former Government may be so consummated; and

Whereas it is also declared and expressly set forth in said secret report, that if said purchase money shall be paid to Denmark by the United States, the said sum of about $500,000 will be immediately paid over to said Christmas, agent and representative of the aforesaid, by his Government in pursuance of the agreement and contract already referred to, for the corrupt objects and purposes set forth; and

Whereas the treaty between the two said Governments for the sale of the West Indian Islands by Denmark to the United States is now pending, and its ratification has not been finally consummated by the two said Governments, and the purchase price for the islands has not been appropriated by Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a select committee of 7 members of the House of Representatives be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to examine into the truth of all the allegations and charges made by the said Walter Christmas, agent and representative as aforesaid, in his said secret and confidential report to the Danish Government, as to the methods pursued and to be pursued by him and any of his assistants in the United States, and the contracts made or proposed to be made by him or other persons acting in any way for him, or as assistants to him for the purpose of, or which in any manner had for their object the bribery of or the attempted bribery of members of the United States Congress or of the payment of any valuable consideration of any kind or character to them or to any of them to vote for or to assist in procuring the proposal, adoption, or ratification of the said treaty of sale of the said islands, as aforesaid.

Said committee shall have power to subpoena and examine witnesses, under oath, and to send for records, papers, and all other evidence that may be necessary for a full and complete investigation of the subjects herein mentioned, and it shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and to have such printing and binding done as it shall be necessary. The committee shall make a full report to the House of the result of its investigation at as early a date as is practicable. The expenses of the investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that it is clear, especially as the matter has been amended at the suggestion of the Chair, that this is a matter of high privilege. It has troubled the Chair somewhat to decide how much we should be governed by the statements made by a member of a foreign Government, but the gentleman from Tennessee, having stated on his honor as a member of the House that he believes in the integrity of these charges that have been made—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; I beg pardon. I do not mean—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it. Not that the gentleman vouches for the charges being true, but for the fact that this officer of a foreign Government made the statement, practically brings it in as his own charge.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let me ask pardon of the Chair. I have not stated that these charges are true. I have stated that I believe this report is genuine and that Mr. Christmas, the agent of the Danish Government, has made the charges that are contained in it. I do not say the charges are true.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee clearly vouches for the authenticity of the charges, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That they have been made.

The SPEAKER. In that view of the case, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, the first proof which I desire to offer, and which leads me to believe that these charges have been made in this report, is in the shape of an affidavit made by a man who was formerly a subject of Denmark, who was born in Denmark, educated at Harvard University, and who is now a citizen of the United States. He has made an affidavit, which I will now read:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington City:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, Niels Gron, and made oath in due form of law that he is a native of Denmark, but now a citizen of the United States; that he was in Copenhagen, Denmark, from the 7th day of December, 1901, to the 15th day of February, 1902. That he arrived in the United States, returning from Denmark, on the 26th day of February, 1902, and came at once to Washington City; that he brought with him a copy of the special and confidential report made by Walter Christmas to the Danish Government of date October 1, 1901, less one page thereof, which is missing from the report; that a large part of said report has been published in many of the newspapers of Denmark, and that he himself translated said report into English and delivered a copy thereof to Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, M. C., within the last week; that he knows the said Walter Christmas personally, and that said Christmas, has admitted, in a statement over his own signature, which statement has been published in the newspapers of Copenhagen, that the copy of the report as published in the Danish papers is a correct copy. He further makes oath that he has faithfully translated extracts from Copenhagen newspapers commenting on said report as they appeared in said papers from about February 1, 1902, to a late date, and that he has also delivered said extracts, with the newspapers from which they were taken, to said RICHARDSON.

NIELS GRON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this March 27, 1902.

[L. S.]

AARON RUSSELL, Notary Public.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The same gentleman who makes this affidavit, Mr. Gron, this morning handed me the following statement:

When early in February last the contents of Mr. Walter Christmas's secret report to the Danish Government, relative to the transfer of the Danish West India Islands to the United States, became public, a party comprising a large portion of Denmark's best and most influential men and highest interests, realizing that since Christmas had, in the furtherance of the pending treaty, served by direct authority first the Secretary of State of the United States and afterwards the Danish prime minister, Mr. Horning, it would be impossible to disassociate his efforts from the treaty or the methods set forth in his report from the official negotiation.

And realizing, further, that if the present treaty was consummated and permitted to take effect Denmark would be obliged to stand before the world as having made use of and the United States as having accepted such negotiations as said Christmas sets forth and describes in the above-mentioned report; and since it was thought that that would place the people of the two nations in an unfavorable and regrettable light, I was requested by the party referred to to journey with all speed from Copenhagen to Washington and lay before the representatives of the people of the United States the facts touching certain parts of the negotiations, in order that any further steps taken by the United States toward causing the taking effect of the treaty in question might be done with a full knowledge of the situation.

NIELS GRON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27, 1902.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hands the extracts which this American citizen, Mr. Gron, says he has translated from Danish papers, and some of these extracts I shall read. I have the papers on my desk, and any Danish scholar who desires to do so can have that pleasure, if it be a pleasure to him, to read them. The first article is headed:

LEAVES OF DANISH DEGRADATION.

This paper says:

At the second reading of the finance bill—

In the Parliament or Congress of Denmark—

it was argued as a proof that our ministers to foreign countries are of no value, that Mr. Brun, in Washington—

Mr. Brun, I may add, is the official representative of the Danish Government in Washington—had had nothing to do with the sale of the West Indies. Prime Minister Deuntzer contradicted this, and said that the negotiations could not have been carried on without Minister Brun's assistance. Captain Christmas will certainly think differently. It is a fact that it was he who got the American Government to begin the negotiations. It was he who brought the American Government's envoy, Mr. White, to the Danish foreign ministry in Copenhagen, and it was he who got the mission again in January, 1900, to go to America, where, according to Mr. White's statement, he was persona grata. Mr. Christmas claims that he has had no assistance from the Danish minister in Washington, Mr. Brun.

It appears even from his report that he thinks himself directly opposed by the minister. Before his departure Captain Christmas had expressed to Prime Minister Horning that he feared antagonism from Minister Brun. Mr. Horning then promised him that he would write to the minister and inform him of Christmas's mission. Nevertheless, Christmas thinks he has noticed cold rays from the minister in Washington. While Christmas under his first visit had found open doors and cordial receptions, he now noticed a strong turn in the situation. A part of the press turned against him and wrote uncomplimentary about him, especially was diligent use made of the fact that he had been dismissed from the Danish Navy in disgrace. Mr. Christmas had anticipated that, and on that account had made every effort to get the judgment removed.

The Government had not been entirely unwilling to listen to this, but thought that the actual removal of the judgment should be the final reward when the sale should be accomplished through Mr. Christmas's efforts. The Danish Government in that has without doubt acted very unwisely. Either Mr. Christmas was a man whom the Government could not use, and then it should have nothing to do with him, or else it had confidence in him and his ability, in which case it was its duty to assist him and in every way prevent difficulties. Mr. Christmas went to Senator LODGE, a man who it was not possible to bribe, and requested his advice. Mr. LODGE advised him to go to the foreign minister, Mr. Hay, and tell him how the matter stood. He followed the suggestion. Hay was surprised that Christmas did not receive greater assistance from the Danish side, and he was angry over Rodger's machinations.

The ground in Washington became too warm for Christmas, and he moved to New York. For the benefit of the sales project Christmas had secured the assistance of two press associations, and he had contracts with a C. W. Knox, friend of Senator MARK HANNA, of Ohio, and Mr. Richard P. Evans, a lawyer in Washington, who represented Senator HANNA.

These connections quite naturally made certain demands. Already this to bribe politicians and buy journalists on credit was in itself a difficult matter, and Christmas had nothing else to offer as guaranty than his own promises. He was obliged, however, in several cases to furnish the cash. Where did he get it from? He had nothing himself, and the 6,000 kr. for expenses would reach nowhere for such use. He must have had connections in Denmark.

Mr. Christmas insisted upon getting his banking firm, Seligman, in New York, recognized. For this he claims to have had the promise of the prime minister, Horning. The recognition should mean that the named firm should receive the sales sum and out of that retain 10 per cent, which was to be used as Christmas directed. This recognition would have placed Seligman in a position to guarantee Christmas's promises to his tools, etc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is a further extract from the Folkets Avis, Copenhagen, February 11, 1902, which, in speaking of Christmas's work, prints this paragraph:

And after that it appears to us that the Danish minister, Mr. Brun, has played a perfect stasis rôle, though one should expect him to be fitted for the head rôle. What in the world have we ministers for when they are not to be used on such occasions?

The Social Demokratten, February 17, 1902, in speaking of Christmas's report, among other things, says:

The facts revealed are based upon a confidential report from Captain Christmas to the Sehested ministry. That report was at first only sent to Sehested himself, but afterwards a copy was sent to each one of the other ministers. It contains the information that Mr. Christmas was obliged to bribe American politicians in order to secure their interest for the purchase of these islands. Since he had no money with him, it was necessary to bribe them on credit, which naturally became much more expensive. When it is reported, therefore, that he is to receive 2,000,000 kr., it must be understood that a large sum of money is to be paid to Americans if the islands are sold.

The following extract is from the Nationalitidende of February 14, 1902:

This paper, which, I think, from information I have, I am safe in calling Denmark's most conservative and most careful newspaper, published on this date an article criticizing the negotiations used by Denmark toward America. The following is an extract from a two-column article: "In order to make it specially clear to the Americans how willing we are to let us Jew down we make the offer to pay to get rid of our goods. Like certain businesses giving a coffee-pot gratis with each pound of coffee so Denmark offers the Americans one and one-half million kroner on buying 15,000,000 kroner's worth of islands, and as an explanation for this method of procedure it is whispered secretly and confidentially in corners that this is now once necessary, you understand * * * but by all means keep quiet about it."

It seems as if it never struck Mr. Christmas and those back of him that they by such business principles committed the greatest insult against the United States politicians. How? It is of high importance to the States to secure some little islands, and the leading American politicians must be bribed in order to further or at least not to oppose their country's interests. * * *

An unpardonable use has been made of the State's money secured by the sale of Danish territory, since the sale price belongs without any reductions, including the famous 10 per cent, to the Danish state treasury and to no one else.

Further, Mr. Speaker, in proof that this is a correct copy of the report, we have—

First. Copies of Danish papers in which most of the report has been published.

Second. Christmas himself, in an article over his own signature, published in Denmark's largest politiken on February 11, 1902, admitting that it is his secret report to the Danish Government which is being so freely used for the public, he says:

"There is, however, one point which attracts general interest. How has my report reached out to the public? I sent out at the time this confidential report to each one of the nine ministers which constitute the Sehested ministry. There existed only those nine copies.

"Who has stolen or who has given out this document which now is being so freely used for creating scandal? How, on the whole, is it possible that such a secret document, which, according to the nature of its contents, never should come to the public knowledge, can disappear from the ministry?"

In proof that Prime Minister Horning had promised Christmas 10 per cent, we quote a paragraph from an article published in Vörtland on February 5, 1902.

On January 14, 1901, Captain Christmas sent to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Folkething a written statement in which he recounted his efforts and set forth his claim.

He presented the case thus: That he had definite legal claims, and that he meant to make good such claims at the right time and place. Mr. Horning, former prime minister, was asked if he had made an agreement with Christmas, and Mr. Horning, in a written statement to the minister of finance, Mr. Scharling, dated February 9, 1901, says he had promised Christmas to ask Rigsdagen's consent to pay him 10 per cent if the sale took place.

He asked the Danish Parliament, or Congress—whatever it may be termed—to pay him 10 per cent if the sale took place. He says this contract had been made. In Vortland of February 2, 1902, this paragraph appears:

Captain Christmas commenced his second trip to America on January 7. Previously he had negotiated with Prime Minister Horrning about the pecuniary side of the question. The prime minister agreed that Christmas could operate with 10 per cent of the sales price of the islands. America should pay the money to an American bank. For this Christmas had chosen the firm of I. & W. Seligman & Co., in New York. This firm should retain 10 per cent of the sum and send direct to Copenhagen.

Christmas came to America, Mr. Speaker, from the evidence that I have, in the fall of 1899. The first official step taken in the furtherance of the present treaty was taken because of this trip of this gentleman to America, when he had an interview, as he says in the report, with the Secretary of State.

In the preamble of the resolution I have stated that this man was at one time a representative of the American Government. That appears to be a strange statement. He was a subject of Denmark.

Now, I wish to explain here why I say he was a representative of this Government. He came and presented himself to the Secretary of State and offered in some way to bring about the sale of these islands. The only way by which he became the agent of the United States that I know of was that he was engaged to put on foot the preliminary steps looking to this sale and to the pending treaty. He came to our Secretary of State, and, as he shows in his report, was sent to conduct a diplomat of the United States to the Danish court and there present him.

He was directed first to go to London. He did go to London; and there, as he was told by the Secretary of State, he would find introductory letters to our legation there and further instructions. He went there and was informed that Mr. White, of that legation, would accompany him to Copenhagen, to put on foot these negotiations looking to the treaty of sale. He did go. Mr. White did not go in the same conveyance, as I believe, with this agent from London, but that was on account of the illness of some member of his family; but that is not material. He did join him in Copenhagen.

After this agent met Mr. White in the American legation in London he did, with all reasonable diligence, proceed to Copenhagen, where he met this man Christmas, who, at least at that time, was acting as agent for the American Government, and by him Mr. White was presented to the Danish court or to the prime minister. That he was the guest of Captain Christmas at his hotel while he was in Copenhagen can not be denied, if the report is true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in Denmark the negotiations were handed down from the Horrning ministry, which first put them on foot, to the Sehested ministry, and from the Sehested ministry to the present Deuntzer ministry, which later concluded the pending treaty. So that there have been two administrative changes since the matter was put on foot in Denmark by Mr. Christmas and Mr. White.

As proof that the official negotiations begun by Horrning on Mr. White's visit to Copenhagen were continued through the various administrations I quote from an editorial in the largest Government paper, the Politikan, dated February 10, 1902:

The present Government found this affair far advanced on its coming into power. * * * Though naturally the liberal government could have cut off negotiations, perhaps also on account of previous workers, if they had not been approved of, but what the conservative governments had begun and approved of that the liberal government continued.

I read this to show that the two administrations that followed the Horrning government, which made the contract, continued in existence down to the present date the contract with Christmas to spend this $500,000.

I read again, Mr. Speaker, from the Vortland, February 5, 1902:

The new (Sehested) cabinet on finding the question handed down from the Horrning ministry was, even though it did not itself feel that the sale of the islands was desirable, obliged to continue negotiations with America, which had already brought about the result that there had been sent from the foreign minister of the United States a draft for a treaty.

The same paper on February 13, 1902, says:

When Horrning's ministry was relieved by the Sehested ministry, Mr. Scharling became minister of finance. He was opposed to the sale of the islands, and had been among those prominent men of all parties who had publicly protested against the sale. There was therefore reason to believe that the negotiations with America would be broken off or allowed to run out in the sand.

The Sehested ministry let it become known that it was not with pleasure that it took over the affair from its predecessors. The negotiations with America were not broken off, however, only prolonged through the Sehested ministry and continued by the Deuntzer ministry (which is the present ministry of Denmark), with the result that a treaty between the two countries has been arrived at.

I have shown, sir, beyond controversy, as it seems to me, that this report is a report made by this diplomatic agent of Denmark to his own Government. I have shown that he was a quasi if not a real agent of this Government in instituting these proceedings—that is, the proceedings which led to this treaty. Mr. Speaker, to show that I have not exaggerated the charges made by this corrupt bargainer, and that they are worthy of our consideration and investigation, I propose to read a few extracts from that report. In an interview which this man Christmas had with the prime minister of Denmark in Copenhagen he speaks of his experience in this country. I shall quote literally from this report, but it is too long for me to read it all. I shall ask to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and as a document, but I quote from that report—

Mr. CANNON. What is the report the gentleman speaks of now?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What I now purpose reading are extracts from the report.

Mr. CANNON. What report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The report of Walter Christmas, made to the Danish Government, on which I am commenting. I would read it all, I state to my friend from Illinois, but in my time I could not read it; it would take me more than an hour to read it to the House. I have therefore culled some luscious extracts from it, some delicious extracts, which I am ashamed to offer, and if they be true they ought to bring the blush of shame to every man in this country, and no man, white or black, in it should object to an investigation. If they are true they bring disgrace upon this country here and in every foreign land in the world.

I will quote now from the report some things that this corrupt bargainer says were said while he was speaking with the prime minister of Denmark:

His excellency (that is, the prime minister) expressed himself with greater force than I wish to report. His abhorrence for the political situation in America which made it necessary to offer money in order to bring a political action like that of transferring the islands to a successful termination, but that he had long ago discovered the necessity for making such a money sacrifice and he was ready to grant it.

Further on he says:

Besides, I made the acquaintance of the President's brother, Mr. Abner McKinley, who is a lawyer and has a business in New York, together with his partner, Colonel Brown. These two gentlemen are only very little respected, and their business, which specially consists in securing certain firms contracts and concessions from the Government, is, without question, anything but nice, but both Mr. Brown and Mr. Abner McKinley have the entrée to the White House at Washington. They know most accurately almost all the winding paths through Congress and are well informed as to what members of Congress must be paid, as well as the method which must be used to accomplish it.

And again:

The next day I went to New York, where I remained until November 20, on which day I received a written request to come to Mr. Hay. Mr. Hay immediately told me that he had investigations made both as regards the German company on St. Johns and my chart, that my representations had proven correct, and that he would now take steps to begin negotiations with the Danish Government for securing the Danish colonies.

I asked him to remember that the Danish Government knew nothing of my visit to Washington, to which he replied that he could make no mistake as to my position, since I myself had declared not to possess credentials of any kind, but that Mr. Hay would highly appreciate it if I personally would accompany a trusted diplomat to Copenhagen and secure for him a secret meeting with the chief of the Danish Government.

I gave the minister frankly the information that I had promised, besides others, President McKinley's brother and his partner a certain sum. Besides, I had bound to me two press associations, one in Washington and one in New York, and that I had an understanding with the banking firm I. & W. Seligman & Co. that they were to assist me, all, of course, upon the conditions that the sale of the islands took place.

The minister expressed that he found the political conditions in America horrible, but "that it had been known for a long time, and I can let you dispose of the 10 per cent, but not any more." His excellency asked me what I thought I would make out of the affair. I replied that it hardly would be very much. His excellency: "That you must certainly try to arrange, for more than 10 per cent I can not secure for you, and it would be too bad if you should get nothing for yourself."

Again he says:

It was not alone the members of Congress I had to invite.

He is speaking at this point in the report of inviting members of Congress to dine with him at the Hotel Raleigh in this city. He says:

It was not alone the members of Congress I had to invite. I had as my special assistants two men, C. W. Knox, who was an intimate friend of Senator MARK HANNA, and Richard P. Evans, a lawyer in Washington, who represented Mr. GARDNER and his friends in the House. These took an active part in the personal agitation, since they talked with a large number of members of Congress and agitated for the purchase of the islands.

I had contracts with them both, according to which they and through them certain members of Congress should have a share of the commission if the sale took place; but the two gentlemen's agitation, expenses, etc., bills in restaurants and hotels, I had to pay. The two press associations, Abner McKinley, and Brown, Evans, Knox, and others, I had promised that their contracts should be guaranteed by the house of Seligman. To this the banking house had agreed, as it should in one way or another have to be recognized by the Danish Government.

Mr. Speaker, I could make more of these quotations, but I will not take the time of the House. It is enough to show what a report this creature has made to the Danish Government, this man whom our Secretary of State used as an agent—I was about to say tool, but as an agent—to carry a trusted diplomat from our legation in London to the court at Copenhagen, who there entertained this trusted agent and procured him admission and introduction to the prime minister of Denmark, which resulted in putting on foot the negotiations leading to this treaty.

Now, sir, I am not here to charge, and I do not charge, that any American Member or Senator has been bribed in this matter, but here is the declaration of this agent of the Danish Government and of our own Government that he had contracts for $500,000 of the money which we supposed we were paying into the treasury of Denmark for these islands, to be used, as he says, for the corrupt purpose of bribing American Congressmen.

Does not this demand an investigation at our hands? Are we to sit here and permit this paper to be published in the leading papers not only of Denmark and of the United States—because a portion of this report making these charges has already been printed in a Philadelphia paper and in some other papers in this country—but printed also in the newspapers in all the capitals of Europe? I have seen a notice of it in the London Times. It has been printed, I venture to say, in the leading papers of every capital in Europe. These charges have gone forth to the world that there is a condition of affairs in the United States Congress, as described by this agent to the minister of state in Denmark, which is characterized as something that is simply horrible and which it appears the minister said has been known for a long time.

Does such a state of affairs exist, Mr. Speaker? Every member of Congress can be called and interrogated upon his oath whether or not he met this man Christmas, whether or not he dined with him at the Hotel Raleigh, and if he knows of any improper means having been used in any way to make public opinion in favor of the ratification of the treaty for the purchase of the Danish islands. I repeat that I do not say these charges are true. I have brought them before the House from a sense of duty. And in order that this House and the country may see that I have not exaggerated, that I have not misquoted the allegations made in the report, I shall ask that it be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Then each gentleman to-morrow morning can read and digest it with his breakfast, if he desires to do so.

Mr. Speaker, one other point. I have so far made no reflections upon any American official; but I do say this, that these facts that I have submitted here, the newspaper extracts, show that the charges of corruption against the American Congress have been public in Denmark, and the allegations at corrupt contract business have been published there since the 28th day of January. These things have appeared daily in the papers at Copenhagen. We did not know, and I take it that the Senate of the United States did not know on the 17th day of February that $500,000 of that money had been bargained away for the corrupt purpose of buying them and you and the balance of us, into the support of the treaty of sale; and yet on the 17th day of February the American Senate almost unanimously, as I believe, and as has been published in the newspapers, ratified the treaty.

Did they know, Mr. Speaker, when they ratified the treaty that these things were being published in Copenhagen, Denmark? Did these United States Senators, did the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate know this? I do not know, but this is the first time the attention of this House has been called to this disgraceful charge. I have shown you that the publications began as far back as the 28th of January, that they continued through the first half of the month of February. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is, it seems to me, one thing unpardonable in this whole business, and that is that the Department of State must have known of the publication of these infamous charges in Denmark and in Copenhagen for two weeks, or nearly three weeks, before this treaty was ratified and took no notice thereof so far as I know.

If with full knowledge of these facts, with the light turned on as this report turns it on when published; if, in other words, with full knowledge of all the facts, the Senate of the United States—Senators of both parties—said, "We will ratify this treaty," I would bow to their act. But I do not believe that these facts and charges were in their possession when they voted with so much unanimity to ratify this treaty.

Were they not entitled to have these facts? We have an American minister at the court of Denmark, resident in Copenhagen. Where was he from the 28th of January until the 17th of February, the day the American Senate ratified the treaty? Do you suppose he failed to give notice to our premier; do you suppose that our Secretary of State was not in full and complete possession of these allegations? If so, I respectfully ask if the American Senate and the American people were not entitled to have the benefit of these charges?

Mr. Speaker, this matter is still here with us, as we have not appropriated the purchase money. I am not here to oppose the purchase of the Danish Islands; I am now of the opinion that we ought to own them. They are right at our door. I think we need the harbors that they offer there. I am not objecting to the purchase; but I do object, I have the right to object, when you come and ask me to vote for $5,000,000 to pay for these islands, that I shall not be asked to vote that appropriation with knowledge such as these papers bring to us, that $500,000 of this $5,000,000 are to be used for the corrupt purposes indicated in that report. We had better keep that sum ourselves. The report shows, I think, that we could have purchased the islands for $4,000,000 or even less.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have nothing further to say. I believe that these resolutions ought to pass unanimously. I believe they are worthy of the attention of the House. The charges may not be true. I do not vouch for their truth. But here they are in the report of our own agent and the report of the agent of the Danish Government. They ought to be investigated fully and a complete report be made. If the American Congress has been foully slandered, as I believe, and as I hope the proof will show it has, no man will rejoice more than myself.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman begins, I ask that I may be allowed to print with my remarks the reports which I have referred to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the report which he has named. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman to whom that report was addressed? It has not been stated by the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I beg pardon. I thought I had stated it plainly. The report is addressed to the Danish Government by Capt. W. Christmas, and gives his full Danish name, W. Christmas Dirckinck Holmfeldt, October 1, 1900. It is addressed to the Danish Government.

Mr. OLMSTED. Who is the Danish Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir; to the Danish Government.

Mr. OLMSTED. What officer of the Danish Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No officer is named. It is addressed to the Danish Government.

Mr. OLMSTED. Just addressed at large, then.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is addressed to the Danish Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, as he is going to print the full report: Is there anything to indicate that Christmas was simply trying to get a rake-off of 10 per cent, explained it this way, and he could not get it unless he made some such statement?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is nothing in the report to that effect.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the first portion of the "whereas" read again. I would like to see whether the statements that are therein recited are recited apparently with the approval of the House of Representatives and by its indorsement, or merely the reported statement of this man Christmas. Perhaps the gentleman can answer?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Let it be read for more certainty.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the first section of the preamble will be read.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman has gone over it so frequently I would like to see whether it is a declaration of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas one Walter Christmas, a subject of Denmark, who is now and has been for several years a diplomatic agent and representative of the Government of Denmark, authorized and empowered to negotiate with the Government of the United States for the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, and who was also the agent of the United States for the purchase of said islands, has submitted a secret and confidential report to his own Government.

Mr. HITT. That I object to. I object to that recital being put in the mouth of the House as a declaration of the House. If the gentleman will put it that "it is alleged" or "publicly stated," there will be no objection, but I object to putting a declaration like that into the mouth of the House, that he is a representative of our Government. I can hardly consent to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman's technical objection comes too late, but I do not want any snap judgment. If the gentleman from Illinois thinks the word "alleged" should be inserted, I see no objection.

Mr. HITT. I ask that at the beginning it may be made to read "Whereas it is alleged." Do the words after the second "whereas" contain any such allegation?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it does I will look at it and make the insertion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I came in a few minutes after the gentleman from Tennessee began to make his statement. I have listened to him as carefully as I could in his reading of the extracts of this alleged report, and as near as I can get at it on the wing, it seems that some man by the name of Christmas, a Danish subject, that acknowledges himself a briber and worse than a thief, makes certain allegations, and upon those allegations it is proposed to make an investigation, not whether any Senators, but whether any Members of the House of Representatives have been guilty of bribery. Am I correct? Is that the scope of the investigation?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not propose by any admissions to limit the extent of it; the resolution shows the extent. It is to investigate the whole matter from beginning to end.

Mr. CANNON. It was held to be privileged, because it related to members of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It includes members of the House. One member is named in the report.

Mr. CANNON. One member is named?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; he says that he had dealings with him; or at least he mentions the name of one member whose representative he had employed here in Washington.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that escaped me and I would like to have it read. While the Clerk is finding it, I want to suggest—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that that is not a part of the resolution; it was a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What I read, if the gentleman from Illinois is referring to that, is an extract from the report. I read several extracts. What they mean the gentleman can infer as well as I.

Mr. CANNON. Does any extract which the gentleman read, or does the report upon which this investigation is to be founded, if it is ordered, make a charge of bribery against any member of the House of Representatives?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why, undoubtedly, it makes a charge of bribery. It says that he made contracts for the bribery of the members of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Contracts with whom?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I read the names of the men; I do not care to go over that again. Has the gentleman from Illinois just come in?

Mr. CANNON. I came in after the gentleman from Tennessee began his remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He says that he had contracts with several gentlemen; I can read them again if the gentleman desires.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, Mr. Speaker; it seems to me it would be wise to make this investigation, if it be worthy of an investigation, and, as this document is to be printed in the RECORD, and as that part of the gentleman's remarks that I listened to was the reading of extracts from newspapers and then his own impressions and remarks, it seems that nothing would be lost if this whole matter should go into the RECORD, and to-morrow morning, after members have had the opportunity to see what is substance and what is not, if it all is not substance the House can take such action as it sees proper.

There is no man on the floor of this House that does not desire that a full investigation be made if the honor of any man is authoritatively called in question in his official capacity or otherwise in the performance of his duty as a Representative. But I do not believe there is a man in this House that desires an investigation of a mere statement of an acknowledged thief. I would be glad if it could go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois make a motion to postpone to a certain day?

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will accept it. I will say to the gentleman that I make the suggestion in the greatest good faith.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I offered this in the greatest of good faith, too, and I shall not agree to it.

Mr. CANNON. It ought not to be passed before the membership of the House have had a chance to read the statements on which the gentleman founds his motion; to read the papers from which the gentleman read very incomplete extracts.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In reply to the excited and agitated remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, I will now tender this report to the Clerk and ask to have it read, in order that the gentleman may understand what it is. I am perfectly willing to give all the facts that I possess, but I could not undertake to read all that matter in my time, because, as I said, it would take too long.

Mr. CANNON. We can not follow it from the reading. Therefore, having the floor, I move that this whole matter be postponed until to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. On that we want the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say something in reply to what the gentleman from Illinois has said on his motion if he will yield the floor to me for a few moments before he attempts to close debate.

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. About ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he questions the right to move to postpone this matter to a particular hour; but the gentleman may move to postpone it till to-morrow, subject to other privileged matters. This will be privileged to-morrow, if the motion is made and adopted to postpone until to-morrow without the clause "after the reading of the Journal."

Mr. CANNON. Well, I desire to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. That will make it a special order for to-morrow morning.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask whether this motion, if adopted, would interfere with the special order for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from Illinois should prevail, this business will be the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then I hope the gentleman will make his motion apply to Saturday instead of to-morrow, so as not to interfere with the special order for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This will be privileged to-morrow morning if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois should prevail. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think, from what the gentleman from Illinois has said, that he addresses his remarks to the true gravamen of this situation. I may be old-fashioned in my ideas, but I believe my country's honor ought to stand above everything else. Now, it is not merely an individual's honor that is at stake in this matter; that would be a small consideration as compared with the honor of our country. That is the question at stake here; that is the true question that is to come for trial before this House.

I care not what you put in your resolution or how you may make it privileged. I say that this fact exists and is shown, that a man—I do not care whether he is a thief or a knave—that a man by the name of Walter Christmas came to this country, attempting first in his own individual behalf to negotiate a sale of these islands; that that man went back to Denmark, accredited by the Government of the United States, to introduce our diplomatic agent to his own Government. Be he thief or knave, he carried our commission for that purpose, and it is denied by no man. When he had done that and the negotiations were opened, it is not denied—nay, it is recognized—that he was sent back here by his Government, not as an official agent, to negotiate this sale.

Mr. Brun, the Danish minister, represented his Government in an official capacity; but it is not denied, and the official records of Denmark show it—it is admitted by the ministers of the Sehested ministry—that this man was the unofficial agent of Denmark to negotiate this trade. Be he thief or be he knave, I care not. They sent him here, and he dealt with our people in this matter. Now, what is the result? He goes back to Denmark and makes a report to the Sehested ministry of what he has done here, and he says in that report to the ministry of his country that he has contracted to expend $500,000 of the purchase money of these islands with American citizens, with members of Congress and of the Senate, and press associations, for corruption purposes. For what? To put through a bargain that we say is just and right, a proper trade, yet we stand committed before the people of Denmark to the effect that it is necessary to use bribery and corruption in order to get through a proper and legitimate trade with the American people.

Now, what this man says may be untrue. I pray God that it is untrue. But he has made the charge. As these reports show, here is an affidavit stating that this is the report of which this thief or knave—as the gentleman may call him, but the accredited agent of the Danish Government, the unofficial agent—has made to that Government, saying that he has used $500,000 for a corruption fund, here under the Dome of our country's Capitol.

Are we to laugh that down? Are we to say that because this man is a knave, that he has no character, that we are above reproach and stand there in that position before the nations of the world? Mr. Speaker, and my fellow-members, if that is the position the American Congress is to take when our country's honor is involved, then I say that the day of our degradation is not far distant. No, it is not merely a question of knowing. I do not believe it is so. I hope it is not so. I hope this man has lied—lied from beginning to end—but when governments use men for corruption purposes they do not use honest men, and this man reports to his Government that he has used their money for corruption purposes.

We do not expect to find them using an honest man for that purpose, but we do know that he has made this report to his Government, that it has been published in the Danish papers, in the London papers, and in probably every paper of Europe, and there our country stands discredited in the face of the world; and would you deny the right of Congress to acquit ourselves; would you deny us the right to show to the world that we have clean hands in this matter? That is what we are demanding. We are not demanding the right to know if some poor weak individual, if it be so, has fallen by the wayside, but we do demand a committee to investigate this matter and show to the nations of the world that the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States stands with clean hands in this transaction.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from Tennessee inform us of the date of that report?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. October 1, 1900.

Mr. HITT. Is it an official document, or is it a statement from a newspaper?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is not official. It is a typewritten statement.

Mr. HITT. Is it a copy, or purporting to be a copy, made by some one who has had an official document, or is it printed from a newspaper? I could not understand from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is impossible for me to tell how this document got out of the archives of Denmark, but I have produced the evidences, which are satisfactory and conclusive to my mind, that it is a faithful copy, except one page, and I have produced the affidavit here—

Mr. HITT. That is the affidavit of a translator.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; the affidavit of an American citizen who was in Copenhagen.

Mr. HITT. Does he say it was a genuine report?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. He says that this is, in his judgment, a copy, and that Christmas has admitted that it was a copy, as published in the newspapers there, of his secret report. That is what he says.

Mr. HITT. The matter was so obscurely stated that I could not follow the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. HITT. We know what official documents are.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not say that it is; I do not vouch for it, and I am not going to attempt to answer the denunciations of your colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who says this man is a thief, an admitted thief; but this record shows that he was the trusted agent of Denmark, and it shows one Department of this Administration, the Secretary of State, used him to introduce our minister, Mr. White, at the court of Denmark.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just one word, and then I will ask for a vote. I never heard of this man Christmas until now. I have no knowledge or information about him, but, on his bare statement, he is a briber and worse than a briber; a thief; that is what I said.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What does the gentleman think if our Secretary of State sent a man like that with our minister from London to Denmark?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman is not fair to our Secretary of State.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not unfair. I do not want to be unfair, or to have you put me in that category.

Mr. CANNON. Even upon his own statements, he states—or this man states, and he indorses it—that he came as a secret agent of Denmark—diplomatic—and that the Secretary of State, taking him at his word, told him to go to our representative in London and he would go with him to make these negotiations, and therefore the gentleman says artfully—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no; it is no art of mine.

Mr. CANNON. That the Secretary made him our agent. Now, Mr. Speaker, one word. I do not know what the fact is about this matter. If there is anything that ought to be investigated, I am for investigating it; if there is anything in this resolution that is omitted, it ought to be inserted. If there is anything in it that ought to be stricken out, it goes without saying that it ought to be stricken out. It is brought this morning before us, a long document that the gentleman does not read nor purport to read—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. One moment. With a lot of newspaper extracts, and they are to go into the RECORD in toto. Now, then, when this investigation begins, it ought to begin on a proper resolution. Therefore, in common justice, in common fairness, and in common discretion, in my judgment, this matter should go over until to-morrow. It can go into the RECORD and we can have an opportunity to read it, and then, in the light of that information, each individual member of the House can be in condition to act intelligently. The gentleman is not more swift than I am—neither of the gentlemen—to investigate all things that affect Federal officials or the American Congress.

I ask a vote upon my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. For a question.

Mr. CANNON. I yield for a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman imputes to me some art in what I said about the Secretary of State. Now, I said, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State must have known from the 28th of January until the 17th of February, that these reports were being printed in Denmark papers, and I did say that I thought the Secretary of State should have called the attention of the Senate to it, and if that is a reflection on the Secretary of State, I stand by it. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the Secretary of State should have called the attention of the United States Senate to the fact that $500,000 of this purchase-price money was to be used for corrupt purposes, as alleged, whether truthfully or falsely.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know that the $500,000 was used. I do not know anything about it, and until I do know more than the gentleman from Tennessee seeks to know I will not rise in my place and seek to cast dishonor upon any man connected with the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the gentleman that the passage of the resolution does not reflect on anybody. We are seeking to keep them from being reflected on. I hope the motion will be voted down, and that gentlemen who are anxious to come to the relief of the American Congress will show it by voting down the motion.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, the gentleman fears the reading of the document in full by all the members of the House which he read extracts from.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That statement of the gentleman from Illinois is not true, and I ask now, before we vote upon it—I have asked and I repeat it—I ask unanimous consent now, Mr. Speaker, that this full report be read at the desk.

Several Members objected.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I prefer that you act upon the full report and not upon my own statements.

Mr. CANNON. It will keep until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that the consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, Friday.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I think in all fairness that we should have the resolution and document read.

Mr. SULZER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent that it be read now.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understand it (the resolution) has been amended by the gentleman from Tennessee since it has been read in the House. I understand the preamble has been amended. The gentleman took it for that purpose, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I added the word which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] asked me to add. I added the word "alleged."

The SPEAKER. The House is clearly entitled to have it read. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent again, as we are to vote on this matter, that the full report be now read. Objection was made a while ago with the idea of the matter going over, but we ought to hear this full report. I mean the full report on which the gentleman bases his resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will first be reported, as requested.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the word "alleged" may not appear there as often as the gentleman from Illinois wishes. If not, it can be inserted.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order while the Clerk reports the resolution as amended. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas one Walter Christmas, a subject of Denmark, who is now and who has been for several years an alleged diplomatic agent and representative of the Government of Denmark, authorized and empowered to negotiate with the Government of the United States for the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, and who was also the alleged agent of the United States for the purchase of said islands, has submitted a secret and confidential report to his own Government; and

Whereas the said Christmas, agent and representative, as aforesaid, in his said report to his said Government declares and sets forth, among other things, the fact that the Government of Denmark—

Mr. HITT. Stop right there. The essence is right there in the assertion that he has made the report. It should be "alleged" to have made a report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HITT. That word should go in right there.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the said Christmas, agent and representative as aforesaid, in his said alleged report—

The Clerk continued to read as follows—

has contracted, agreed, and obligated itself to pay and turn over to him, the said Christmas, 10 per cent, or about $500,000, of the proceeds of the purchase money arising from the sale of said islands to the United States, when the same shall have been paid by the United States to Denmark, for the express purpose, as has been declared and set forth by him in his said secret report to his Government, for the bribing of members of the United States Congress and other prominent citizens of this country, and for subsidizing American newspapers, to the end that the pending treaty between the United States and Denmark for the sale of the islands by the latter to the former Government may be so consummated; and

Mr. HITT. No. Whereas it is "alleged" that it is declared. That is what it should declare.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no objection to putting the words in, and I am willing that the gentleman from Illinois shall insert the words himself.

The Clerk read as follows:

In his alleged secret report.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will add the words "it is alleged" after each of the whereases it will cover the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is a matter to be investigated, and I do not want any snap judgment on it.

The SPEAKER. That correction will be made, if there be no objection, after each whereas.

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. I would call attention, further, to the fact that the attack is not made on American newspapers, but certain press associations, and you are investigating the whole of the American newspapers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Speaker held that we do not investigate the newspapers anyway.

Mr. LACEY. The resolution does not conform with the facts as stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to correct the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair did not so hold.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I so understood.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. LACEY. The resolutions ought to conform to the facts as the gentleman alleges them to be, as alleged.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am of the opinion that the word "newspaper" is used in Mr. Christmas's report, and in some places "press associations," but, Mr. Speaker, where "newspapers" appear I ask to add "or press associations."

The SPEAKER. This change will be made. Does that cover the matter desired to be read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]?

Mr. WANGER. I would like to hear the first whereas read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this will be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that one Walter Christmas, a subject of Denmark, who is now and who has been for several years an alleged diplomatic agent and representative of the Government of Denmark, authorized and empowered to negotiate with the Government of the United States for the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, and who was also the alleged agent of the United States for the purchase of said islands, has submitted a secret and confidential report to his own Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee of investigation: Mr. DALZELL, Mr. HITT, Mr. COUSINS, Mr. MCCALL, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Mr. DINSMORE, and Mr. COWHERD.

Report to the Danish Government from Capt. W. Christmas, Dirckinck Holmfeldt, October 1, 1900.

To the Danish Government:

As early as May 4, this year, I permitted myself to hand over to his excellency the prime minister a report of my work in the affair of the Danish West Indian Islands, while at the same time I requested that there might later be given me the opportunity of more fully explaining the case in person. Since in the meantime no such opportunity has been afforded me by his excellency, there remains no other way open to me than by a renewed request to attempt to secure the high Government's attention to this matter.

I believe it necessary to express myself as explicitly as possible with regard to all the details, as I am anxious to give an accurate and complete picture of what has happened to me in this affair, an affair about which I dare believe it will be understood has been one of honor and for the highest good, in which, therefore, I believe I owe those men who have assisted me, no less than myself, as clear a presentation as possible of all the relations and conditions pertaining to it, without which it will be impossible for my efforts to receive fair judgment.

INTRODUCTION.

In order to explain how I, on the whole, came to interest myself in the sale of the West Indian Islands, let me briefly show how these islands, ever since my childhood, have played a rôle in my life and how circumstances have constantly kept my interest in them awake.

My family's economical situation has been closely connected with our colonies in the West Indies. My grandfather, Admiral Christmas, was in his time a very wealthy man. He invested his whole fortune in plantations on St. Croix, which in the beginning gave him a large income. The liberation of the slaves gave him and the other plantation owners a severe injury, which he never got over. At his death he was ruined, and the State took over his plantations. No wonder, then, that my interest in the West Indian colonies was early aroused. As second lieutenant I sailed down there on board a koffardimand and remained on the islands about six months.

I have since, both in men-of-war and privately, visited the islands seven times in the last ten years. I have seen how the plantation owners have become gradually impoverished, how one business firm after another has failed, and how shipping has been reduced. Often I have prepared plans for the betterment of the conditions on the islands. I have tried to establish a steamship connection between St. Thomas and St. Croix. I have worked out and sent to the Government a proposition for a more economical rule (or government) of the islands, and I have tried to start a company for the purpose of making use of the fertile soil on St. Johns by the help of Chinese coolies, but without success, since never have I met in this country any interest for the West Indian colonies. All have skeptically shrugged their shoulders whenever future possibilities for the distant islands were suggested. Without exception all have (at any rate heretofore) expressed the opinion that the islands' only future lay in annexation to the United States.

By studying the old West Indian literature, especially that touching the Danish Islands, I saw that the English, in the beginning of the century, won the colonies and appear to have had the intention of uniting them to the English West Indies. It was the intention of the English to establish a naval station at St. Thomas, but changed this plan when they discovered the large harbor on the east side of the St. Johns. Two English ships were sent into Coral Bay, the whole harbor was carefully measured, and a chart made of it. In the English naval chart archives may still be found the large chart showing what a splendid, deep, excellently protected, and clean harbor St. Johns has, especially adapted to a naval or war station, as batteries or forts can be placed on far-extending peninsulas and on Bock Island, which absolutely protects the entrance. I got the idea that that harbor could be made a new and important source of income to the colonies. I decided to attempt to get established a large and modern harbor, where nature had pointed out such a good place and such excellent conditions. I did not doubt but that good use could be made of such a harbor, since the West Indies, as far as harbors are concerned, is the poorest archipelago in the whole world.

THE HARBOR PROJECT AND ITS RESULT.

In the fall of 1898 I went to the West Indies and examined the conditions on St. Johns. This island has but very few plantations, but the numerous ruins of large stone houses and mills which lie scattered between grassy paths and shrubs remind one of former culture and the soil's fertility. There is to be found splendid grass plains for cattle and extensive woods containing valuable species of wood. I got a large amount of the island's land upon my hand and returned to Copenhagen to secure money for my project of buying the land and using it and for putting the harbor in order for receiving ships.

I worked upon that for several months; secured also a loan of money from different persons interested in my undertaking, but failed to secure enough capital to carry my plan through. I was then advised to seek capital in Germany, and that in a short time I succeeded in doing in Berlin. A syndicate was formed, and I went again to the West Indies, this time in order to study the conditions on the English and French islands and for the purpose of measuring and making a chart of the harbor on St. Johns. This I accomplished in the spring of 1899 and returned to Berlin with chart and plans.

The German syndicate that in the meantime had established itself was "Die Kolonial und Handelsgesellschaft St. Jun," and had laid large plans for bringing the island in under the German sphere of interest by first buying up all the land and afterwards to put the harbor in order for German commercial ships and men-of-war. The plan had been presented to authorities of the German navy, who seemed to look upon it with favor, for just as desirable as it was for Germany to secure a foothold in the West Indies, so impossible did it seem if they should proceed openly by offering Denmark to buy the islands, for it was known that America would never allow another European power to establish itself in the West Indies. On the other hand it seemed possible that Germany, through the indirect way, as proposed by the Company St. Jun, could make use of the newly made harbor and gradually, as time would pass, secure control over the harbor and over the whole island.

I could have no scruples in working for that plan, since nothing could happen without the knowledge and consent of the Danish Government. To a degree it would be necessary that the directions of such a harbor company should be Danish, and leave its seat in Denmark.

The plan was, as already stated, adherence at the highest places, and it was attempted to get the Hamburg-American Line, which had about 60 steamers running in the West Indies, to take up the affair. That company's director, Mr. Ballin, had several conferences with the St. Jun Company director, Admiral Zirkón. Herr Ballin requested certain guaranties of the Government, which it hesitated to give, and the negotiations proceeded very slowly.

On my return from the West Indies the directors of the "Company St. Jun" asked me to go to Denmark to seek the Danish minister of finance, with a view of securing such concessions as to make the establishment of the new harbor possible.

In June, 1899, I sought Herr Schlichtkrull, department chief in the ministry of finance, and later the minister of finance, Horning, and presented to them both the plan, and at the same time explained to them how the situation had evolved itself. The minister was not disposed to give concessions or permission to establish a new harbor, and he expressed as his opinion that the only thing which could be done for the West Indian Islands was to transfer them to America. Such a transfer would, in the opinion of the minister, be the final outcome. I informed the German syndicate of the result of my interview with the minister of finance, and secured an agreement whereby I would be able to do as I might think best in the project of establishing the harbor in return for paying the syndicate a sum of money.

During the summer of 1899 I found out, quite by chance, that a circle of men in this country, in connection with some Americans, had, in 1897, attempted to effect a transfer of the West Indian colonies to America. That committee consisted of General Bahnson, Captain Bluhme, Redaktor Corstensen, Count Frijs, Folkethingsmand Christopher Hage, Fabrikejer Hagemann, Atatsraad Gustav Hansen, Højesteretsrægt Octavius Hansen, and Redaktor Hörup. The committee, through a native Dane, Mr. Neils Grön, stood in touch with a number of American financiers, Mr. H. H. Rogers, Mr. Flint, etc.

As already noted, the patriotic motive of this committee was to effect the transfer of the West Indian Islands to the United States. It worked with the knowledge and full authority of the Danish minister of finance, and the minister had given his consent to let the committee dispose of 10 per cent of the sales price for furthering the project, since it was taken for granted that the political conditions in America were such that an affair like the sale of the islands could not be carried through without a substantial expenditure of money.

Upon Mr. Hagemann's proposition, Mr. Neils Grön, in the name of the Danish committee, was to apply to Mr. H. H. Rogers for his assistance, and Mr. Rogers declared himself willing to put the matter through Congress on the condition that he be authorized to dispose of 10 per cent of the price. It was further arranged that the banking house of J. Pierpont Morgan in New York and Privatbanken in Copenhagen should represent the Danish Government. The first-named banking house should receive the sum from the American Treasury and deliver it to Privatbanken less 10 per cent, the commission to be paid to America. The work of the committee came to nothing, because the breaking out of the Spanish-American war stopped negotiations, which were not resumed later. But the committee still existed, inasmuch as it had never dissolved itself formally, and its subcommittee, consisting of General Bahnson, Herr Hagemann, and the chairman of the committee, Etatsraad Gustav Hansen, kept in constant touch with the American syndicate through Mr. Neils Grön. This I discovered later, as when I went to America I thought the above-mentioned committee had long before given up the project of sale, and on the whole no longer existed.

When I decided to take up the question of a sale, I presented myself to Department Chief Schlichtkrull and laid before him my plans. Herr Schlichtkrull expressed it as his conviction that my plan would find recognition if it could be carried through, since it was clear to the Government that it was best to hand over the islands, and the department chief expressed besides that there would hardly be any difficulty in getting the right to dispose of the 10 per cent commission, as the previously mentioned committee had had. Department chief inquired of the minister if he would receive me, and on the following day I called on the prime minister.

The minister assumed a very skeptical position toward my project, since, evidently, he did not believe that I could accomplish anything in America. What I specially desired was to get permission to dispose of the same amount of money as the committee three years before and to secure a statement as to the amount Denmark would be willing to accept for the West Indian Islands.

The prime minister assumed a very distant attitude as regards the first question, and said that if my plan succeeded could I (this expression his excellency used) figure upon the same support as the committee. His excellency expressed himself with greater force than I wish to report—his abhorrence for the political situation in America, which made it necessary to offer money in order to bring a political action, like that of transferring the islands, to a successful termination, but that he had long ago discovered the necessity for making such a money sacrifice, and he was ready to grant it. As to the amount desired for the islands, the minister did not wish to commit himself. He said:

"I can surely not then give you the islands in hands that would be quite contrary to all feelings of dignity."

And later:

"On the whole, it is not the idea to sell the islands. To that thought is His Majesty opposed. What could be done is to arrange a transfer on such conditions that we sustain no loss, but it must not appear that we sell."

When I left the minister he said:

"I must honestly admit that I can not see how you can accomplish your project; but, of course I can not forbid you making the attempt, especially since the undertaking can become of value to the country. One can not cast away the private intuition which is necessary, especially here, when the Government can do nothing. It must constantly be remembered that what must be done is to get the American Government to take the first step toward acquiring the islands. The Danish Government is absolutely ignorant of your journey and undertaking."

From that conversation I considered myself at liberty to draw the following conclusion:

- (1) The Danish prime minister and minister of finance desires nothing better than the transfer of the islands on conditions fair to the inhabitants.
- (2) The minister considers it necessary and is willing to place a portion of the sales price to further negotiations in question at the disposition of "the private initiative."
- (3) "The minister will accept a sum of money for the islands which will cover all expenses, the Colonial debt pension, etc., so that the country get out of the affair without loss."
- (4) That my object was to get the American Government to take the first step without having the Danish Government officially even suspect anything of my undertaking. I dare insist that my understanding of the four points was correct, and I have strictly kept to them point for point, as the following will show.

MY TRIP TO WASHINGTON.

In October, 1899, I went to America via London. I had no connections there, and not as much as a letter of introduction, but I had a decided opinion as to how I should manage, and I had good cards on hand.

(1) On President McKinley's platform in 1896, together with a few reforms of vital interest to the Union, was expressed the desire of securing the Danish West Indies Islands. The President and his followers, the Republicans, naturally, therefore, must consider the acquirement of our islands as being important, and therefore it would hardly become difficult for me to interest the Government in Washington in my plans.

(2) I knew the sentiments of Americans against Germany and their anxiety as regards an attack upon the Monroe doctrine. I could clearly show that the idea of securing directly or indirectly the Danish Islands was not strange in influential circles in Germany.

(3) I knew that the Americans desired to establish a strong naval harbor in the West Indian waters. On the independent Cuba that could not be done. Porto Rico does not own a single good harbor, but America had nevertheless chosen San Juan in Porto Rico as the best place, and had voted $3,000,000 to improve the harbor. (That project was stopped after I had been in Washington.) St. Thomas Harbor is neither large enough nor especially suited for a naval station, whereas the harbor on the east side of St. John complies with all the requirements of that harbor. I made a chart, and I felt confident that just that harbor would open the eyes of the Americans to the value of our islands.

All three suppositions proved themselves to be absolutely correct.

From among the many banking houses in New York I chose the firm of I. & W. Seligman as one of the most recognized and most respected, and which at the same time stood in close touch with the Government. The house Seligman is there the American's Naval Department special financiers, and is often used by the Administration in Washington to handle large money transactions. I have never had occasion to regret that selection. Since it was necessary for me to secure an introduction to President McKinley, Mr. Seligman secured me the same through a friend of the President, a wealthy shipbuilder of San Francisco, Mr. Scott.

Besides, I made the acquaintance of the President's brother, Mr. Abner McKinley, who is a lawyer, and has a business in New York, together with a Colonel Brown. These two gentlemen are only very little respected, and their business, which specially consists in securing certain firms' contracts and concessions from the Government, is without question anything but nice, but both Mr. Brown and Mr. Abner McKinley have the entrée to the White House in Washington. They know most accurately all the winding paths through Congress, and are well informed as to what members of Congress must be paid, as well as to the method which must be used to accomplish it.

As the situation was, I could not be too particular in the choice of my assistants, and I must say that the gentlemen, Mr. Brown and Abner McKinley, have rendered me excellent assistance.

Ten days after my arrival in New York I was informed that Mr. Scott had secured me an introduction to the President, and that he awaited me. I went to Washington, and obtained an audience with the President, who received me most cordially. I informed him of the object of my visit, while I pointed to his platform of 1896, and expressed it as my personal conviction that the Danish Government would scarcely refuse to consider with favor a proposition from the Americans for the transfer of the islands on conditions which should prove fair to the inhabitants of the colonies. I made it clear that I acted entirely on my own responsibility, had no connection with the Danish Government, and told my motive was simply my own pecuniary interest in such a sale.

The President admitted that he had always considered it natural and right that America should take over the islands, which, as he expressed himself, had for a long time been on the market. I made sure of that expression to remark that I had every reason to believe that the Danish King would never allow his colonies "to be on the market;" that His Majesty, on the other hand, found it out of harmony with the dignity of the country to sell any part of the land, but that it would be of much economic advantage to the islands to get it under the large Republic, and since His Majesty has only the good of his subjects at heart, do I feel sure that the King will not oppose any arrangement which will give to the Danish Islands such advantages as the natural harbor of the West Indian waters, the United States can offer them.

The President closed the audience when there were announced six Indian chiefs. He requested me to seek Secretary Hay the following day and to discuss the matter further with him, and thanked me for the visit.

The next morning I was received by Mr. Hay in the foreign ministry. I had taken with me my large chart of the harbor of St. John and a pamphlet I had written on the conditions in the West Indies, the fertility of the islands, the harbor conditions, etc.—in short, all which could make the Americans desirous of buying the islands. Mr. Hay, however, did not need much information. He appeared to know all regarding the islands; also that a Danish committee had sought to secure the Government's interest for the sale three years before. Mr. Hay was well informed as regards the unfortunate pecuniary status of the islands, and asked why Denmark did not permit the colonies to export sugar duty free to the mother country. When I laid my chart of St. John's Harbor on the table, it at once caught his interest. He asked me why it was that Denmark had so far neglected so excellent a national harbor as not even to have it marked off by buoys, etc.

I said that we had enough in St. Thomas Harbor which was quite good. Mr. Hay did not appear to take special interest in St. Thomas Harbor. He constantly returned to the harbor of St. John, and evidently believed my chart to be very unreliable. I showed him how much that harbor was thought of by others, and that if America did not care for it then it would interest Germany so much the more. That made a strong impression on Mr. Hay. He became actually very excited when he learned that a German company had contemplated making use of the harbor and of buying the whole island. Once he exclaimed: "They are trying to sneak into the West Indies, are they?"

When I was through reading the papers showing the above, he requested that he might be permitted to keep them and my chart while he thought over the affair. He got my address, and I went. The next morning early I was called up to Mr. Hay. That time Admiral Bradford, Chief of the Navigation Department, was present. My chart lay on the writing table, and both by Mr. Hay and Mr. Bradford I was cross-examined for about an hour. It was evident that the interest in the Danish West Indian Islands was advancing.

The next day I went to New York, where I remained until November 20, on which day I received a written request to come to Mr. Hay. Mr. Hay immediately told me that he had had investigations made both as regards the German company on St. Johns and my chart, that my representations had been proven correct, and that he would now take steps to begin negotiations with the Danish Government for securing the Danish colonies.

I asked him to remember that the Danish Government knew nothing of my visit to Washington, to which he replied that he could make no mistake as to my position, since I myself had declared not to possess credentials of any kind, but that Mr. Hay would highly appreciate it if I personally would accompany a trusted diplomat to Copenhagen and secure for him a secret meeting with the chief of the Danish Government.

Admiral Bradford said: "I have sent in my report of the Danish West Indian Islands, and especially over St. Johns Harbor. I can tell you that my report could not be more favorable to your plans," and the Admiral followed me out in the hall and said: "I will let you know that I not only wish the islands for the Navy, but I intend to demand them."

On the 28th November I received two letters from Foreign Minister Hay, in one of which he informed me that he had written to the ambassador in London about my early arrival. The other was an introduction to the ambassador in London, Mr. Choate.

I could first get away on the steamer sailing December 4, and as a friend of mine, Mr. W. G. Pedersen, had started on the 29th of November, I delivered to him a primary report to the prime minister, at the same time requested him personally to inform the foreign minister, both of which he did.

When I, on the 12th of December, announced myself to the American ambassador in London, Mr. Choate had already received information as to my mission from Mr. Hay, who had given orders that the first secretary to the legation, Mr. White, should incognito go with me to Copenhagen and there confer with the Danish Government about the transfer of the islands. Mr. White's wife was in the meantime very ill, and he had gone south with her, but had not come farther than Dover, where he awaited a good crossing over the Channel. I decided immediately to go to Dover. Mr. Choate had received instructions from Mr. Hay to keep secret, if possible, the conferences about the sale of the islands. Mr. Choate proposed that Mr. White should meet the Danish minister some place outside of Copenhagen, to which I replied that the minister himself must decide that, but that I would make the proposal. The proposal, however, was not accepted. On the same day I arrived in London I went over to Dover, where I met Mr. White. The next morning we went together to Paris, where we parted. White brought his wife to Bordighera, and I went to Copenhagen.

Mr. White kept me assured of his movements by telegraph, and on the 9th of December he arrived in Copenhagen.

IN COPENHAGEN.

In the forenoon of the 16th December I arrived at Copenhagen. Dr. F. Hansen, son of Etatsraad G. Hansen, who had traveled with me from New York, where to some extent he assisted me as secretary during my activity for the sale of the islands, had arrived in Copenhagen two days before me. Mr. Hansen had, without my knowledge and desire, sought an audience with His Royal Highness the Crown Prince, in order to inform him of my arrival with an American diplomat.

Dr. Hansen has concisely written some of his recollections about several personal happenings. I quote therefrom the following:

"As regards what has happened in America, I can add nothing above what Captain Christmas has already stated. I visited Mr. Hay in Washington one of the last days in November for the purpose of obtaining some papers, and he requested me specially not to say anything about the affair to the American minister in Copenhagen. On the homeward journey I parted from Captain Christmas in London, since he went to Dover to meet Mr. White, and I went directly to Copenhagen. On my arrival here I immediately sought an audience with the Crown Prince, who at that time was Regent during the King's absence. I told him exactly all that had happened to us during our stay in America, about the United States Government's strong desire to get the matter through and about Mr. White's early visit to Copenhagen. His Royal Highness expressed his doubt as regards the possibility of bringing the matter to an early termination. It has several times failed just as it was almost completed. That it would not be safe to be too hopeful before the matter was entirely finished, although it would greatly please His Royal Highness if I should be proven right in my optimistic view, that Captain Christmas had actually been able to put the matter through."

"About a week after I was informed that Gehejmekonferentsraad Vedel to a private person (Generalinde Bruun f. Bluhme) had expressed his disapproval of the fact that I went about and told that I had something to do with the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands. Since I knew that I was absolutely not guilty of any indiscretion, and that His Royal Highness the Crown Prince was the only one with whom I had discussed the affair, I sought Gehejmekonferentsraaden to get the mistake corrected, and on that occasion had a prolonged conversation with Gehejmekonferentsraaden. It appeared that he actually had entertained the idea as above expressed."

"He admitted, however, his mistake after hearing my presentation of the affair. Gehejmekonferentsraad Vedel appeared in the beginning to feel strongly against the idea of having Captain Christmas having anything to do with the affair. It appeared, however, that His Excellency changed his mind slightly after I had more closely informed him of the circumstances, especially after he had heard of Christmas's relation to the prime minister, Mr. Hørring, and about the accomplished results, viz, Mr. White's visit to Copenhagen."

So much for Dr. Hansen's report.

Gehejmeraad Vedel had, however, as above said, expressed himself with indignation about my efforts in America to Generalinde Bruun, who evidently believed that I had taken the affair out of her son's (Kammerherre Bruun, in Washington) hands, and at once wrote and told him the whole affair, which should have been kept secret. This was the reason for and the beginning of Mr. Bruun's jealousy and enmity toward me, feelings which he, even in affairs of so great importance, could not control while I worked for the Danish Government in America.

Two hours after my arrival in Copenhagen I presented myself to the prime minister in the treasury department. The minister received me very cordially and was greatly interested in hearing how the affair had evolved itself, and about Mr. White's expected arrival. The minister said:

"Well, thanks to God, that the sale now can be brought about, I must compliment you for what you have accomplished. I had really not believed that it would have been possible for you."

The minister would not agree to meet Mr. White either in Roskilde or in Malmö. "I can not see what is the use of all that secrecy. The meeting must naturally take place here in the foreign ministry." Some time after His Excellency asked what language I thought Mr. White could use. I answered that besides English I knew he could talk excellent French, which I had experienced in Paris. The minister replied: "It is too bad that of those two languages I am not at all familiar." I: "It is possible that Mr. White understands German." The minister: "German I understand quite well; that is, I can read, but I lack entirely the practice in speaking it." The minister ended up by proposing that the foreign minister, Mr. Ravn, should meet Mr. White instead of himself.

The prime minister asked me about the conditions. I informed him then how I had insisted upon both over for President McKinley and over for the foreign minister in Washington that the Danish Government would not in any way make a business out of the islands, and would only consent to a transfer on such terms that Denmark should not sustain a loss. I had said as my opinion that the sum would likely come up to about three and a half million dollars, but I said to the prime minister that the American Government would be sure to give more if it was demanded. The minister said: "We can hardly do it for less than $4,000,000," to which I replied that it would be sufficient to show Mr. White that, and the size of the sum would play an unimportant part.

I then touched upon the question of the commission and pointed out how I, in conformity with the minister's expressions to me before my departure, had allowed myself to make use of the same 10 per cent which the former committee had had a right to dispose of. I gave the minister frankly the information that I had promised, besides others, President McKinley's brother and his partner a certain sum. Besides, I had bound to me two press associations, one in Washington and one in New York, and that I had an understanding with the banking firm, I. & W. Seligman & Co. that they were to assist me, all, of course, upon the conditions that the sale of the islands took place.

The minister expressed that he found the political conditions in America horrible, but "that it had been known for a long time, and I can let you dispose of the 10 per cent, but not any more." His excellency asked me what I thought I would make out of the affair. I replied that it hardly would be very much. His excellency: "That you must certainly try to arrange, for more than the 10 per cent I can not secure you, and it would be too bad if you should secure nothing for yourself." I: "If it should come short (for 10 per cent is not very much to use for such an undertaking), would it not be possible for your excellency to secure me some from home?" His excellency: "That I can not guarantee you. I can only promise you to do my best in that way; but you know very well how narrow-minded are the peasant members of the Rigsdag." The minister asked me if I was personally acquainted with the committee, and proposed that I should meet with the members of it. His excellency said:

"The committee will surely take the greatest interest in the undertaking. They are excellent people; especially Mr. Hagemann can be of great assistance. He is well acquainted with American conditions. It will be of great assistance both to you and to me if the negotiations are supported by the committee."

I promised to put myself in touch with the committee immediately. As one will see from the above, I had every reason to be satisfied. The prime minister had on no point disavowed me. He had complimented me for what I had accomplished; had expressed himself willing to negotiate with the American representative upon the same basis as was mentioned in Washington. The islands should not be sold, but transferred to America, on the condition that Denmark sustained no pecuniary loss. The minister had given me right to dispose of 10 per cent of the commission and had even promised to do his best to secure for me a commission besides what I could make out of the 10 per cent.

Etatsraad G. Hansen's son, Dr. Folmer Hansen, applied in my name to his father, the committee's chairman, and requested a meeting. That was brought about the next evening, though only the subcommittee met, since several of the members were absent from the city. The subcommittee consisted of the chairman, Etatsraad G. Hansen, General Bahnson, and Fabrikker Hagemann.

The chairman, and afterwards Mr. Hagemann, expressed themselves satisfied with what I had accomplished, complimented me on that point, and afterwards we discussed what was further to be done. It was agreed upon that a new plan had been adopted for accomplishing the sale of the islands, brought forward by a new man, and based upon new chances—as, for example, the new harbor on St. John—but that the aim was the same as when the committee worked, as well as the means for accomplishing the result, viz, the 10 per cent commission. As regards that point, none of those present had entertained the slightest doubt, and that is best shown by the fact that the gentlemen unanimously advised me to effect a relation with the American members of the syndicate, the gentlemen Gron and Rogers, in part for the purpose of giving over a proper portion of the commission to them. Not only would it be dangerous to secure those gentlemen's enmity, but their assistance would to a high degree further the undertaking. Especially Mr. Gron had done a great deal of work for the sale of the islands before, and therefore had a right to consider himself entitled to a pecuniary advantage. I felt convinced of the accuracy of all that, and wished no thing more than the opportunity of working together with Gron and Rogers. I promised to offer to them as much as was possible of the 10 per cent.

Later it will appear that I offered to them over half of the commission—namely, $200,000.

Etatsraad G. Hansen offered to give me a letter to Mr. Gron and Fabrikker Hagemann and one to Mr. Rogers.

We next discussed Mr. White's expected arrival and his conference with the foreign minister, and Mr. Hagemann then showed how important it was that the islands were admitted into the American tariff union. I promised to talk with Mr. White concerning that. Of our conference that evening, as well as later, a report was made in the committee's journal by Etatsraad G. Hansen personally. It will therefore be easy to have confirmed if my statements are true.

On the evening of December 19 Mr. White arrived, and I drove him to the Hotel Phoenix, where during his stay he was my guest. In order to remain as much as possible incognito, I gave his name as "Schwartzkopf, from Berlin." That precaution, however, was not worth much, since a couple of times daily he received telegrams under his right name from his wife at Bordighera. In the meantime he visited no one here, not even the American minister. He was always in my presence. The only ones who recognized him was Baron Reedtz Thott and Baroness Reedtz Thott, who one day sat at the table next to us at the hotel.

On the 20th took place the meeting at the foreign ministry, but before that Mr. White came to my room and requested instructions on different points that might be brought up in the conference. I still hold a piece of paper upon which he had written down three points, to which I added the question of the tariff; unfortunately to no avail, since the foreign minister forgot entirely to mention it, and Mr. White did not feel himself under obligation to offer better conditions than were demanded from the Danish side.

For the sake of precaution I asked Mr. White how he intended to introduce the conversation, and he replied: "Why, of course, I will tell him that as Denmark wishes to get rid of the islands we might buy them at a reasonable price."

I tried to make him understand that that was the very worst thing he could say, and he promised to begin thus: "That the United States Government, under the just inaugurated colonial-expansion policy, had discovered the advantages which America could secure from acquiring the Danish West Indian Islands, but that naturally the American Government could not possibly under any circumstances intimate to Denmark their possible willingness to buy them before secretly they had secured from the Danish Government the intimation that they were willing to part with their colonies."

Mr. White assured me after the conference that he had used the very words I have said above, and added: "I never saw a man smile like the old fellow when I had given him just your words, so I think they were exactly what he wanted."

I accompanied Mr. White to the foreign ministry and presented him to his excellency. Since I remained in the antechamber, I do not know what took place, except from Mr. White's report, and, since he was in a rather playful mood, I will not repeat his report, except in an abbreviated form.

The minister had declared himself willing to negotiate with America about the transfer of the islands upon such a basis that Denmark should receive enough to cover the colonial debt and the expenses to pensions, etc. To Mr. White's question as to the size of the sum, the minister replied that it would perhaps come to between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000. That gave the American later an opportunity playfully to say, "The old fellow was not much of a business man. Why didn't he ask $4,000,000 or $5,000,000? Of course he can not expect us to give him more than $4,000,000 after that."

During the conference Kmhr. Krag was called, and he and Mr. White then went into the archives, where the necessary material from the minister of finance was to be obtained, so that Mr. White could take notes of the islands' budget, debts, pensions, Crown estates, etc.

Under that adjournment of the conference, Minister Hørring, accompanied by Department Chief Schlichtkrull, came in to find out how the meeting had resulted. Both appeared well satisfied when they later passed through the antechamber where I stood, and the minister said a couple of friendly words to me.

After Mr. White came out from the archives he remained for a short time with the minister. The conference lasted about an hour. We then took a long walk together, during which Mr. White recounted to me the whole of the conversation with the minister and Mr. Krag.

Mr. White was very well satisfied with the result of his journey, and he expressed it as his conviction that the islands before one year would be American. He said: "The price is not at all the question; but as your Government won't make any bargain, why, of course we don't wish to pay more than necessary. It is a very fine feeling (not to wish to sell the islands). We Americans are more in the business line, don't you know. We hardly understand those feelings." Mr. White departed that evening.

When on the following evening I met with the subcommittee I informed them of Mr. White's report of the conference, and especially that the tariff question had not at all been discussed. Mr. Hagemann was very angry about that, as well as the other gentleman, and found that it was absolutely a scandal that the most important point had been forgotten. He predicted that there would spring up a strong sentiment against the sale of the islands if the colonies did not get free trade with America.

Mr. Hagemann was certainly right therein, for if the sugar from the islands could be sold on the American market without duty the property there would rise in price 40 per cent. I offered then to telegraph Mr. White and request him to add to his report to Mr. Hay in Washington the demand for free trade. That request was accepted. Mr. White answered by telegraph that the desire would be complied with. A letter to me from Mr. Hagemann of December 27, 1899, shows the importance he places on the question of free trade for West Indian Islands. He writes: "Thanks for the information as regards Mr. White's report. It was fortunate that the most important point of all was considered from the beginning."

I have during my whole work in the affair of the West Indian Islands sought assistance and counsel from a lawyer to the supreme court, Mr. Salomon. It is therefore quite natural that I at the time, while I was constantly conferring with the prime minister (naturally keeping Mr. Salomon constantly informed of such conferences), should several times request Mr. Salomon in my stead to talk to the prime minister, to whom I had, with Mr. Salomon's consent, expressed the fact that he was my adviser. Mr. Salomon answered my request that he naturally would be ready to seek the prime minister in case he should express the desire to see him, but that without such expressed desire he could not trouble the minister by requesting a conversation.

However, on the 27th of December a conversation took place between the prime minister and Fr. Salomon, since the latter, without any request from me, on that day sought the minister. I have requested Fr. Salomon himself to write down and present to the prime minister a report of their conversation and everything else known to him regarding my work for this affair. To this report, the contents of which are known, I take the privilege to call the High Government's attention.

It was clear to the prime minister that it was necessary for me again to return to America; that I, as it were, had all the threads in my hand, and knew the persons who should agitate during the coming negotiations and acts in Congress. Besides that, Mr. White had urgently advised the foreign minister to let me complete what I had begun, since I, as Mr. White expressed it, was persona gratissima in Washington.

In the meantime I had used up all my personal means during my trips to West Indians and America, since the Danish Government had now accepted all my plans touching the sale, and furthermore desired to make use of my assistance, it appeared to me reasonable that the Government should pay my journey, or at least a part thereof. The prime minister was perfectly willing to do this, but he had no funds from which to take the money. It was then arranged that Mr. Hagemann should advance me a sum of 6,000 kroner, against the guarantee of the minister of finance. That sum should be regarded as an advance on what I should make out of the 10 per cent commission. Hagemann brought about that arrangement by, together with Etatsraad G. Hansen, calling in the ministry of finance. Regarding that advance, Mr. Hagemann writes me on December 28: "Etatsraad Hansen and I have just come from the prime minister, who, in accordance with your statement yesterday, requested me to assist you by advancing an amount not exceeding 6,000 kroner, in the form of a letter of credit. That shall be done."

It has always been clear to me that it would be difficult for the prime minister to make any written documents regarding the affair, neither as regards credentials for authority nor guarantees for what by word of mouth was promised me, especially on so delicate a matter as the use of the 10 per cent. The prime minister's word was naturally sufficient. There was that possibility that the minister might die while the affair was in progress, but in that case I should have as witnesses to what was agreed upon such prominent men as Department Chief Schlieckkrull, Fr. Salomon, and the members of the subcommittee, and in case of a change of ministry, all were convinced that the prime minister would give his successors all the information necessary regarding the situation and those binding promises which were the basis for my work for the sale of the islands and upon which hung both my moral and pecuniary existence.

In the meantime there were two difficulties which had to be overcome, and in this the minister had to act personally.

The minister in Washington, Mr. Brun, I have known from my childhood. He has always been an energetic and intelligent man, but reserved and peculiar; an extremely sensitive man about his own dignity. As soon as I heard Dr. Hansen's experience with Gehejmraad Vedel and Generalinde Brun I knew that Minister Brun would be my enemy. I informed the prime minister of this and showed the great danger the whole affair would encounter if Mr. Brun began to intrigue against me in Washington. The prime minister recognized this, and decided to write a letter to Mr. Brun in order to make him assume the right position over for me. At the same time could that letter serve to clear another difficulty, namely, to show the Danish Government's relation to the banker I had promised, and whom the Government's chief had accepted; but the prime minister did not like to write directly to Seligman, and it was necessary to find a means whereby the firm could receive some official recognition.

The prime minister then promised me that in his letter to Mr. Brun he would recognize Seligman as the American bankers on whom I could depend, and who should receive the price of sale for Denmark, and afterwards send it to Privatbanken in Copenhagen with a 10 per cent discount. The prime minister requested from me a copy of my contracts with the firm of J. & W. Seligman & Co., and I sent the copy to the minister's private house in Tordenskjoldsgade. The prime minister's letter to the minister in Washington was sent. The contents I am not acquainted with, but the results I know. Mr. Brun worked with great energy against me. He was successful in ruining my position and my name in Washington. He refused to enter into relations with Seligman, and thus I never got my bankers recognized. About that later. I shall only in this connection remark that the recognition of my bankers was the basis for my whole effort. I had no money above that which I should use personally, and to bribe politicians and buy journalists on credit is naturally very difficult. At any rate, guarantees must be furnished.

By recognizing my bankers the prime minister gave me the necessary pecuniary backing for the money offers it was necessary for me to make in order to get the islands sold. This the minister recognized, and expressed it both to me and to my lawyer, Salomon. The Danish minister in Washington should have by word of mouth given the necessary recognition, but he refused it absolutely.

There was one more affair to arrange before I started on my journey. I had been dismissed from the service of the navy by a court-martial, and that fact could become ruinous to my efforts if anybody should use that easily obtainable weapon against me in Washington, and thereby make me impossible with the American Government. When the prime minister had used my service and secured for me the means for the journey, since I had already had personal intercourse with the President and foreign minister of the United States, and since I was the one who had personally presented the American diplomat to the Danish foreign minister, it appeared to me in harmony with all the parties' interests that my position should be changed.

I therefore applied in this connection, to the men about whom I know, that he both deserved and possessed the absolute confidence of the prime minister, viz. Mr. Hagemann. Mr. Hagemann realized that my desire was opportune, and promised to take up the affair, about the good result of which he had no doubt, but the good result did not come. Mr. Hagemann has since told me that he did all he could for me, but in the meantime the withdrawal of judgment against me was refused for the present, but intimated as a possibility in the event of the success of my mission. I should here remark that the minister of the navy, Ravn, at one time prevented me from resigning, since I preferred that to dismissal by court-martial. Mr. Ravn said to my father, who gave in my resignation: "Your son can at the very highest only receive a couple of months in the fort, and that is nothing to speak of. Besides, if he sends in his resignation he will not receive that recognition that is due him on account of his courageous work in Siam."

In this matter Mr. Ravn prevented me from resigning, and I thought that I could expect from him that he would make use of this opportunity to make good again the injustice which he had previously done. But I was mistaken. My dismissal by court-martial should continue to hang on me as a chain about my leg. Neither the foreign minister, Ravn, nor the prime minister wished to take up the affair, and what I anticipated happened. My enemies in America made use of this means to the fullest extent. Mr. Braun started the startling news that the man who had gone between the American and Danish Governments had been kicked out of the Danish navy by a court-martial both in the American foreign ministry and in the good society in Washington. Mr. Neils Gron took good care that the press got hold of the scandal and was delicately used.

The day after Mr. White had been at the foreign ministry it was published in the papers (from Danish journalists). It went over England to America, and thereby Mr. Rogers and Mr. Gron secured the information that the affair of the islands was again up.

On the same day that I left Denmark Mr. Hagemann received the following telegram from Mr. Rogers:

"MAR. 11, 1900.

"Danish islands up again, with prospects of success if worked with proper parties. Would like authority to speak.

"H. H. ROGERS."

Mr. Hagemann sought me at the hotel and gave me a copy of telegram. Together we wrote an answer, which was as follows:

"MARCH 1, 1900.

"The sale is in official channels. Have protected your interests. Await arrival Captain Christmas, St. Paul, with introduction to you.

"HAGEMANN."

On January 5 I received in London the following:

"Captain CHRISTMAS, Hotel Savoy, London.

"Following cable is sent: 'Sale is in official channels. Await arrival Captain Christmas, St. Paul, with introduction to you.

"HAGEMANN."

I left Copenhagen on January 8 after I had had a farewell audience with the prime minister. The minister asked me to do all in my power to get the price up to $4,000,000; told me about his meeting with my lawyer, Salomon, to whom he sent his thanks for the visit he (Salomon) had paid the minister; advised me with much cordiality to be sure to see that I got my share out of the 10 per cent, and said in conclusion: "God be with you, and do not forget to send frequent reports."

No one who knows anything about the affair doubted that on my departure I had commission from the Danish prime minister to work for the sale of the islands, and that I had the right to dispose of 10 per cent of the sale price. I do not know whether from a legal point of view there is a difference between a verbal and a written authorization. Certainly from a moral point of view there can be none. There can be no difference between a man's verbal promise and his written one. The supreme court lawyer Salomon has clearly expressed himself to me as to his understanding of the relation between the prime minister and myself and as regards the authorization given me. The subcommittee also had no doubt on that point.

Mr. Hagemann requests me that all money transactions in regard to the sale should go through Privatbanken, on the ground that that bank at a former time was interested through him. He would not make such a request to me if he did not know that I had it in my power to arrange the money matter as I might think best.

And when Rogers later (see below) telegraphically requested subcommittee to leave me "disinterested Christmas" the gentlemen replied: "This is impossible, since 'matter is officially in Christmas's hands.'" The subcommittee recognized thereby again the authorization I had received from the prime minister and called it "official."

IN AMERICA.

On the same day that I arrived on the steamer St. Paul in New York I sent the two letters of introduction to Mr. Rogers and to Neils Gron.

The first I met the day after in his office in the city. Mr. Rogers is a man of about 60, extremely wealthy, but, in spite of his large fortune of about $50,000,000, exceedingly desirous of making money. He is the most active member of the Standard Oil Company, and is both hated and feared in the money world on account of his absolute inconsiderateness in his money operations, which yearly demands a great many offers, both on New York's and Chicago's exchanges. Mr. Rogers was evidently dissatisfied because I had taken hold of the sale of the islands, and he repeated several times, "I wish to make money by this, and don't you forget it."

I asked what sum he demanded for his assistance in the affair, but as to that he would not commit himself. He requested me to see Mr. Gron and further to negotiate with him. When I left, he said, "Now, Mr. Christmas, I don't know if we come to an agreement or not; but, mind you, this island business will never pass through Congress without my consent. I am able to swing 26 votes in the Senate, and don't you forget it."

I sought next Mr. Neils Gron. This man is a Dane by birth, and has gone through Harvard University. He leads a more mysterious existence than any man I know. He calls himself a journalist, but is not connected with any paper. Most people look upon him as a kind of secret agent either in the service of the police, or else in one or other company's service; but no one, in fact, knows anything about his means of existence or his efforts.

Mr. Gron was absolutely unapproachable. He presented to me the choice of securing him and Mr. Rogers as enemies, which, in his opinion, would make the sale impossible, or to give the whole over into his hands and depart for home. I should have nothing to do with disposing of the 10 per cent commission. The next day, however, he sought me and offered me $25,000 of the commission. This was an impossible condition, since I had already disposed of a much larger sum, and I answered him that more than half of the commission it was impossible for me to offer to Rogers and him. Gron refused that offer and prophesied that I would soon realize my error in not handing everything over in his hands.

The next day he brought my wife a long article regarding the sale of the islands, which had the heading, "Pretty woman in St. Thomas deal," and spoke of my wife in the most scandalous manner and expressed insinuations regarding the Danish King. I feel convinced that no other than Gron himself had inspired that article. No American journalist could have known the special relations mentioned therein.

The next day two large New York papers contained interviews with me. My expressions regarding the sales of the islands and the Danish King's position toward the sale were the height of indiscretion and lack of tact. In one of the interviews I told the reporter that President McKinley's brother was to receive an enormous sum of money for bringing about the sale. I had had no interviews whatsoever and had not talked to a reporter since I landed in America. I protested both verbally and in writing to the different editors, but no attention was paid to my demands for a retraction.

I do not hesitate to assert that these and all other false interviews and compromising articles originated from Mr. Gron, directly or indirectly, and thereby he began a fight against me which should last for over two months. Mr. Gron's use of the press absolutely astonished me. It was first later that I found out that Mr. Gron's means are often used in America and that, on the whole, it is placed at the disposition of him who has money enough to offer. It is difficult at home to judge of Americans, and especially American press conditions. I, at any rate, had never dreamed to what a degree the American press is for sale, both for political and other speculations and intrigues.

During my whole stay in America I fought constantly with Mr. Gron to get him to work with me, or at least to cease to oppose my efforts. Late in February I offered him and Mr. Rogers $300,000 if the sales price should be $4,000,000. He accepted this, but a week later he broke his agreement and demanded more. During the last part of my stay I was compelled to use strong means to compel him to my side, and I succeeded in getting a binding contract between us. It was at that time too late to get the island question through Congress during the spring session, but it could be passed during the coming winter session. The contract provided that Gron and his friends should dispose of two-thirds and I of one-third of the commission.

I was so much the more anxious to arrive at an understanding with Mr. Gron, as I was afraid that he could overthrow my work, and besides Mr. Gron had—I regret that I have to say—his very best assistant in the Danish minister, Mr. Brun, who at the same time was my worst enemy.

As I have previously remarked, our minister in Washington, even before my arrival, worked against me. Mr. Brun was, through his mother, Generalinde Brun, already, before my departure from Copenhagen, made acquainted with my work for the transfer of the islands, and that scarcely on a favorable basis for me, as Generalinde had, through Mr. Vedel, according to Dr. Hansen's report, got the impression that I was interfering with the minister's work, which, humorously enough, also seemed to be the minister's own impression.

One could imagine that the minister, from principle, found it improper that unauthorized private persons should appear as politicians, but that was by no means the case. Mr. Brun knew perfectly that I appeared with authorization from the prime minister, especially as he had received written information on that point from the prime minister, and he had at the same time for a long time been acquainted with the former committee's work. Mr. Brun stood even in a very intimate relation to Mr. Neils Gron, whom I several times met in the minister's home. Mr. Gron was always well informed what of interest had taken place regarding the affair in Denmark, and he prided himself upon his good relation to the minister—proud because he knew that I had nothing to pride myself upon in that connection.

The minister did not feel himself in the slightest degree obliged to do anything for me because the Danish prime minister had commended me to his consideration, and he stated several times that, as he had no order from the prime minister, he could not undertake to assist me. The banker Seligman he would have nothing whatever to do with.

Upon the minister's sympathy for Gron, whom he knew opposed me, and his antipathy for myself, I shall not dwell any longer, but I must here express my indignation that Mr. Brun attempted to make me impossible in Washington. He used, in order to create distrust of me, that easily obtainable and unworthy weapon—my discharge from the Navy—and it was made use of in the foreign ministry with members of Congress, with certain journalists, and in the circles of society where my wife had been well received.

As I have previously related, during my former stay in America I had established relations with the President's brother, Mr. Abner McKinley, and his partner, Colonel Brown, besides I had bound to me two press associations in New York and Washington. These different connections brought me once more in touch with a number of Senators and Members of Congress. Congress, in the middle of February, was taken up with the Nicaragua Canal treaty and the extension of the fleets, and both of these affairs had to be disposed of before the question of the Danish Islands could be brought forward.

I shall attempt, in setting forth my work in Washington, to keep close to the reports and letters which I, after agreement with the prime minister and the committee's chairman, Etatsraad Hansen, forwarded to them, and I use quotations from both reports in order to illustrate the progress of affairs.

ETATSRAAD HANSEN, Washington:

Mr. Rogers expressed that he, if he obtained that advantage from the sale which he thought due him, will be pleased to assist me. He requested me to arrange all with Gron, who represented him.

I sent your letter to Gron, who lived at the Waldorf, and next had a meeting with him. I regret much to have to inform you that Gron's position taken over for me was absolutely antagonistic. Gron's opinion is that I have fooled him and ruined his dearest hope that he himself should sell the islands. I had in the meantime substantial hope that I would be able to get Gron and Rogers over. Gron has in the meantime already begun actively against me, as following will show, and he has openly expressed that it was his and his party's intentions to overthrow the affair at present in order late to take it up afresh.

I shall here remark that all that has appeared in American papers called interviews with me are lies from one end to the other. I have not allowed myself to be interviewed and will not. Since the papers, however, have been full of reports relating to me and the sale of the islands, and since it could hurt both myself and the affair, I requested the editor of the Washington Post (the Government organ) to publish a declaration from me. That clipping I inclose. The declaration came out early in order to satisfy the Danish minister here.

I have had a conference with Mr. Hay, who received me very cordially, only he expressed regret that Mr. White's visit to Copenhagen had not remained a secret. He expressed himself very satisfactorily about America's desire to buy the islands. I suppose the question will be brought forward in about a fortnight, as soon as the debate over the Nicaragua Canal and the extension of the Navy is brought to a close.

Papers of all colors have already expressed themselves in favor of the purchase of the islands, and as far as I have heard the Government has both in the Senate and House votes enough to put the matter through.

To-day I am to talk with Senator DEWEY, and other members to whom I have letters of recommendation. In the same way I am to have a meeting with Admiral Dewey, whose influence is very large.

I sent yesterday evening the following cablegram: "Affair looks favorable. Christmas."

I had, as above mentioned, at last made the acquaintance of different Members of Congress, for example, Senators LODGE, DEWEY, CLARK, BACON (the last two were Democrats); members of the House, ALEXANDER, GARDNER, and others. They all took a great interest in the acquirement of the islands, and promised me their very best assistance. I got them to establish the price of $4,000,000, as the prime minister had desired.

In the meantime I, through indiscretion from the foreign ministry, found out that Mr. Hay would only offer Denmark $3,500,000, and that it was therefore important as early as possible to get the sum placed at $4,000,000.

In the last part of January I wrote to Etatsraad Hansen: "Since my last letter nothing official has taken place, but I have accomplished much underhand work. I have been at a couple of secret meetings in Congress, where the plan for future developments was agreed upon. A pair of the leading Senators and some members of the House were present, and the general opinion was that the acquirement of the West Indian Islands would not meet any serious opposition. It was the first intention that some Senators should privately suggest to the President that he should let Secretary Hay apply to the Danish minister here and officially ask if Denmark would sell."

The President, on the other hand, desired for political reasons that the affair should not come from the Administration to Congress, but the reverse. For that reason there is now being prepared a big speech, which on next Wednesday or Thursday is to be delivered by a Member of Congress, Mr. GARDNER, on which occasion the House will express its wish about buying the Danish islands for $4,000,000. That sum has been decided upon and, if the Government of Denmark insists upon it, will be appropriated. It is not impossible that Hay will attempt to screw down the price, but the $4,000,000 can be considered sure.

I have sent you the following telegram: "Four million dollars guaranteed," because I could not know how quickly requests would be made, and therefore you should know what sum you ought to insist upon. All appears, therefore, in a most hopeful manner, and if no personal interests intervene in the affair it will go off easily enough.

In the meantime I am somewhat afraid of Mr. Rogers and Mr. Gron. I have even reasons to believe that the gentlemen have intentions of injuring me in Copenhagen, and especially to try to take the affair out of my hands. I believe in the meantime that that will be impossible. Of course it is of little importance whether I personally bring the matter to a close or not, but if all the arrangements which I made for the furtherance of the matter are now overthrown, would it possibly give occasion to a great scandal and litigation? I will, however, try to come to an understanding with Rogers and Gron, but they assumed, as already said, a very antagonistic position toward me.

I have formerly on different occasions touched upon, and repeat here, that Rogers and Gron tried to persuade the committee to take the authority from me. The reply was: "Impossible; matter officially in Christmas's hands."

In Congress all seemed to go after desire, and on January 30 I was able to telegraph Etatsraad Hansen, "To-morrow the House will vote $4,000,000 for buying the islands."

In the meantime, however, my friends in Congress changed the programme somewhat. Instead of the proposed great speech of Mr. GARDNER, and the subsequent vote of the House, there was in the House brought forward a bill, the so-called Gardner bill of February 1.

I telegraphed to Etatsraad Hansen February 2, 1900, "Resumé Gardner bill yesterday: 'Be it enacted by the House and Senate of Congress assembled, That State Department is authorized to expend the sum not exceeding four millions in acquiring West Indian Islands, and that this act take effect immediately.'"

As regards the significance of that bill, I have expressed myself in my report to the prime minister of the 5th and 2d. By this I have the honor to inform your excellency that all touching the West Indian Islands appears as promising as possible. I had the honor to forward to your excellency a copy of the Gardner bill after previously sending telegraphic resumé of same to Etatsraad Hansen. This bill will possibly not bring the affair to a direct conclusion, but it has established the price as $4,000,000, and that was its special mission, as Mr. John Hay had attempted to acquire the islands for three to three and a half millions. All has now been prepared as well as it has been possible for me to do. The right people are interested in the affair and I have good reason to believe that negotiations will proceed rapidly in the near future if from Denmark's side no opposition arises. As I have previously permitted myself to express, Gardner's bill will not come to play a decisive part, since the Senate is the place where treaties are ratified. The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, whose chairman is Senator Davis, will report the affair favorably and then it will immediately be sanctioned, but since it is the House which appropriates the money it is also of importance that this is considered.

It will be seen from the above that I do not give too much importance to the bill. My efforts have been in the direction of supporting the Danish prime minister in his attempt to get the price for the islands set to $4,000,000, and to that end has the Gardner bill been of service.

It was now my hope that the bill should be put through in the course of a few days, but that did not happen.

There were now in Congress (as Mr. LODGE expressed it) "evil spirits at work," namely, Rogers and his friends.

Senator LODGE, who is the most respected member of the Senate, and who, of all the political persons I have met in America, is the only one that can not be bribed, was my best assistant. It was he who discovered that Rogers was at work, agitating among his 26 Senators, whose votes he thought to be able to control.

Mr. LODGE advised me to seek Mr. Hay, and to inform him of all regarding my antagonistic position to Rogers and Gron. I had at that time offered Gron half of the commission, which sum he refused. Hence I felt that I had done all in my power to win him and friends, for if Gron had received the offered sum, I would have nothing for myself; not even enough to cover my own debt.

I was therefore so angry with Rogers and Gron that I decided to take no consideration whatsoever of them, and to follow the advice of Mr. LODGE. I worked out a statement, took all my papers, letters, and telegrams, and announced myself to Mr. Hay. Mr. Hay became confused, annoyed, and angry when I had told him what was in my mind. He was confused, because I, a foreigner, had secured such an unfortunate impression of the political conditions in Washington; annoyed because Mr. LODGE had sent me up into the foreign ministry, and angry, or more correctly enraged, against Rogers and his people. To me he said: "Well, it may be that these 'trust people' are very powerful, but I will show them that they do not yet rule the Administration of this country or its Congress."

Now I felt no more of Gron's machinations, not even through articles in the press. I could now work in peace for the sale of the islands, and use my best efforts.

I had one article after another published in different papers describing the islands, and often illustrated with photographic drafts that I had with me. I point in that connection to my scrapbook, which contains several hundred clippings. I made the acquaintance of many members of Congress, and had now one, now another, either to dine or to supper at Hotel Raleigh, where I lived. It cost me much money, because Washington is one of the most expensive cities in the world—especially the dinners in the hotels were expensive. It was not alone the members of Congress, but their private secretaries that I had to invite. I had as my special assistants two men, C. W. Knox, who was an intimate friend of Senator MARK HANNA, and Richard P. Evans, a lawyer in Washington, who represented Mr. Gardner and his friends in the House. These took an active part in the personal agitation, since they talked with a large number of members of Congress and agitated for the purchase of the islands.

I had contracts with them both, according to which they, and through them certain members of Congress, should have a share of the commission if the sale took place. But the two gentlemen's agitation expenses, etc., bills in restaurants and hotels I had to pay.

In the middle of January I had to procure more money from Denmark, since the amount I had for my journey was entirely exhausted, and, again, before my departure for America I was compelled to have it replenished.

In the meantime work proceeded rapidly in Washington, and I could count that the matter would have the majority both in the Senate and the House (also between the Democrats was a sentiment created for the acquirement of the islands). I was in the happiest frame of mind, since I believed that all the difficulties had at last been overcome, but just then began my very worst troubles.

As already reported, Mr. Brun talked about my dismissal in such a manner that both Mr. Hay, Senator LODGE, and others came to know it. In different ways I noticed that cordiality by which I had been received cooled. My two assistants, Evans and Knox, referred more frequently to the reports that were circulated, and Mr. Knox even sought the minister and had from his own mouth confirmed the frightful news that I had been discharged and disgraced from the Danish navy.

One day Senator LODGE, in his private room at the Senate, asked me how the matter stood, and when I last had an audience with Mr. Hay he asked me the same question. I could not deny the fact that I had been dismissed in disgrace, and my efforts to ameliorate the situation had no effect.

I had become a suspicious person and blackened, and soon my stay in Washington had become impossible for myself as well as for my wife. Both Mr. Hay and Senator LODGE advised me to take my departure, and I decided to do that and to live in New York, from where I could easily run over to Washington when my presence should be necessary.

But a much worse danger threatened to bring me into the most painful situation. I had not yet secured the recognition of my banker, J. & W. Seligman & Co., and I could no longer do without a guarantee for the sums of money I had been obliged to promise. My own financial means were entirely exhausted; I was obliged to live as economically as possible in New York; I could no longer offer money upon the Senators and Members of Congress, and was obliged to let Mr. Knox and Mr. Evans know that I was not able to pay their expenses.

The two press associations, Abner McKinley and Brown, Evans, Knox, and others I had promised that their contracts should be guaranteed by the house of Seligman. To this the banking house had agreed as soon as it should in one way or other be recognized by the Danish Government. I had the prime minister's absolute promise of such a recognition. I had blind confidence in the promise, but it was not kept. Upon my presentation to the prime minister I received only this reply by telegram, which had no signature, but which I conclude was from the minister. It stated: "Letter received, but incomprehensible. Can not give you or S. any authority."

I then studied out that possibly the prime minister would agree to permit a bank guarantee; and since Privatbanken, in Copenhagen, had requested me to ask Seligman to send them the eventual amount of sale (in which connection Seligman had written Privatbanken), it appeared to me reasonable that the minister would rather let Privatbanken take the affair in hand and give Seligman the desired bank guarantee that the American banking house was accepted by the Danish Government.

I wrote, then, February 25, 1900: "Herr Direktor Larsen, Privatbanken, Copenhagen: I have, after agreement with you before my departure from Copenhagen, informed J. & W. Seligman & Co., New York City, who have been accepted by the minister of finance as financiers in the event of the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, that Privatbanken, from the Danish side, should handle the affair; and Seligman have with pleasure agreed to that arrangement."

Seligman, in that connection, will, by the next post, send you a letter in which will be referred to the strange fact that the firm has not yet received the official confirmation of the recognition from the minister of finance.

I will therefore request from you after conversation with the minister to assure Seligman that they have actually been accepted, in case a sale takes place.

Seligman at the same time wrote Privatbanken, in order to get a recognition established, and received late in March reply from Direktor Larsen. In that letter the director gave the information that he, after conference with the minister, had received the impression that his excellency regarded your firm as bankers for the American Government, but by no means as acting for the Danish Government. Seligman gave me that letter and I believe that from that moment they looked upon me with suspicion. Was it possible also to explain that I to that degree had been disavowed by the Danish prime minister.

In the month of January my whole efforts had been based upon the clear understanding between myself and the prime minister that Seligman should be the recognized bankers of the Danish Government in the sale, and in March the minister declared to the Direktor of Privatbanken that Seligman had actually nothing to do with the Danish Government.

But even a greater surprise awaited me. In order to get that for me so extremely important recognition of Seligman brought about, I advised the counsel to the banking house to write to my adviser, the lawyer of the Supreme Court, Mr. Salomon, to whom I myself wrote on February 25, 1900.

As I at one time explained to you, I had already before my return home in December disposed of a part of the 10 per cent, and had accepted the bankers, J. & W. Seligman & Co., all upon the supposition that the minister of finance approved both of my future administration of the 10 per cent and of the bankers. As you know, the minister agreed to my proposition. As you will understand, I have had great difficulty in giving actual guaranty for the commission I have promised. I myself have only the minister's word to depend on. That is naturally enough for me, but the Americans refused to accept that as good enough.

Here I have been obliged to place my own person and my personal property as security, and, besides, Seligman have, who have absolute confidence in me, placed their highly respected name as guaranty for my administration of the 10 per cent.

The firm now think, as is natural, that the moment has come, under one form or another, to receive confirmation for the fact that the Danish Government actually will use it to finance an eventual sale of the islands. I have, therefore, advised the firm's legal counsel to put himself in touch with you with a view of securing a recognition.

I take it for granted that the minister can not as yet give any official authority, and he has in that matter sent me a telegram, but the affair might be arranged in the same manner as when the minister gave me expense money, viz. through Privatbanken. Direktor Larsen requested me to see that Privatbanken got the business in hand, and I arranged this with Seligman. The sale of the islands will, therefore, be financed by J. & W. Seligman & Co. on this side of the Atlantic and by Privatbanken on the other. In that connection, therefore, it would seem to me that Privatbanken could give the guaranty to Seligman that they could consider themselves the Danish Government's bankers in the affair.

It is very difficult with this "hide and seek" anxiety on the part of the minister. I must have the relation established before it is too late. Seligman ought to have the guaranty that they run no risks in giving guaranties in connection with the 10 per cent, or it will end in their considering me a humbug, in whom they could have no confidence.

Supreme Court Lawyer Salomon, on receipt of his letter, took steps to see the prime minister on my account. As regards the result of the attempt, I received the following telegram:

"MARCH 13, 1900.

"Schlichtkrull, principal, writes indignantly. He won't speak anybody directly or indirectly representing you. Give me explanation."

"SALOMON."

My answer back on the same day was:

"Only explanation, principal crazy."

"CHRISTMAS."

I knew nothing else to answer. I was not only paralyzed from surprise, but entirely confounded by Mr. Salomon's telegram. I had to believe that there was either a mystery or mistake. My brain could not contain the idea that the prime minister who three months ago secured me money for the journey, gave me instructions, had acceded to all my plans and propositions, had shown me the confidence of allowing me to administer as large a sum of money as a tenth of the sum to be paid for the Danish Islands, who, on my departure had pressed my hand in a most cordial manner and wished me "Godspeed"—that he now indignantly refused to talk to anyone who, directly or indirectly, represented me.

And I knew that I had done nothing to which he could take exception. I had offered the best of my ability for the affair. I had talked with several hundred persons, written innumerable articles in the paper, conferred, convinced, bribed, given dinners and suppers, used all my money, borrowed more, and again used it.

But nevertheless this fact was sure: The prime minister would have nothing to do with anyone who represented Captain Christmas.

When I later talked with Supreme Court Lawyer Salomon about the strange situation, he said about the following:

"When I had read the minister's letter I was obliged to believe that you had committed one crime or another over there, or at least a scandal. I knew not what to think."

I had not done anything but to accomplish the work the minister had given me to do. The most remarkable is, however, that after my return when I asked the prime minister why he had written such a letter, if he had anything to complain of regarding me, he answered "No."

In the latter part of February I returned to New York. The affair stood well in Washington, and my only concern was that the Danish Government should sell the islands for less than $4,000,000. On the 19th of February I wrote Etatsraad Hansen:

"One of my assistants in Washington, who has a position in the State Department, has informed me that a whole series of telegrams has passed between Mr. Hay and the American minister in Copenhagen. It would seem, therefore, that an attempt has been made to reach an understanding as to the sum. I hope Denmark will not sell under $4,000,000, but rather would wait over the summer. The American Navy can not do without the harbor, and has demanded it of the Administration. It is quite possible that by waiting until the fall the price can be advanced a million. Senator LODGE thinks soon to have the affair ready in the Senate. It is there that I have found the greatest difficulty, since Mr. Rogers, Flindt, etc., had worked energetically to prevent the sale. The opposition, however, now seemed to be overcome, but I had an exceedingly difficult task and am most likely not through with it yet."

"As long as I was personally in Washington my different assistants waited with some patience on the promised guaranties for the contracts I had made with them and worked energetically, but when I had gone back to New York began to express themselves impatiently, and I was requested again and again to let them know if the Government had yet or would soon recognize Seligman. They did not wish to work any longer upon the uncertainties. They were not accustomed to give credit in political matters, etc. In short, my helpers were beginning to go on a strike."

I did not know what in the world to do, and Seligman themselves began to have suspicion on account of that strange delay by the Danish minister of finance to recognize the firm, which had already shown considerable energy and done much work for the Danish Government.

It was at that time, while I, as I have shown above, made such great efforts to get that recognition established with the lamentable result, I became at last so nervous and helpless in my position on account of the many complaints from Washington, and for fear that the whole affair should go to pieces for lack of guaranties, that I, in my distress, accepted help from a quarter where I greatly regretted to look for it.

And here begins the most painful part of my experience in America. I made Advocate Fischer-Hansen my legal adviser and accepted his help. I have been very strongly criticised for that, but I think the criticism should fall upon those who broke their agreement with me and compelled me to act as I did. Carl Fischer-Hansen, who is a Dane by birth, became a lawyer in New York at a very early age, where he has a large law practice. He is a man of ability, but suffers from the most pitiable vanity and desire to make himself observed. I consider him to be inconsiderate in the choice of means and quite unreliable. He is married into a very wealthy family, through whom he has good connections, especially in the White House.

On my first visit in New York I made Fischer-Hansen's acquaintance, and it was he who presented me to Messrs. Abner McKinley and Brown. As soon as he had heard of the island question he wished absolutely to play a part, but after he had committed a number of indiscretions I withdrew as much as possible from him. Through Mr. Abner McKinley, however, I stood always in a certain relation to him, and did not dare to break off for fear that he should become my enemy.

By and by, as the difficulties increased for me regarding getting my guaranty recognized, Mr. Fischer-Hansen became more and more generous in his offers, and the other side, Abner McKinley, pressed me to accept him.

About the last of February I was very badly situated. I could no longer pay Evans and Knox cash. It was still necessary to work with the press, which cost much money. I wished to secure a large model of St. Thomas, which cost several hundred dollars, and should be exhibited in Washington for the purpose of interesting the members of Congress in the islands. Seligman withdrew more and more, and my people in Washington threatened to lay down the work if I could procure no guaranties.

Then came Fischer-Hansen to me one forenoon at the Hotel Manhattan, and offered his and his father-in-law's guaranty for the sums I had promised, until Seligman should be recognized. He promised to pay for a model of St. Thomas referred to and also to furnish the running expenses in Washington and to the press.

Whatever reluctance I might have had, I did not dare, difficult position, to refuse the offer. The only demands Fischer-Hansen made in return were that I to the Danish prime minister should acknowledge him as my legal counsel, to report to the minister his offer, and to promise to work to the end that he might receive a decoration, which was the aim of his ambition.

Fischer-Hansen guaranteed, as promised, several contracts, and in return I reported to the prime minister that I had accepted Fischer-Hansen as my legal counsel in New York, and praised him, as was natural, for his generous offer. I refer in that relation to my report to the prime minister dated February 26, 1900.

In the meantime a great struggle had sprung up in Congress which lasted for a long time. The fight was about the Porto Rico tariff, and the result of the contest played an important part as the Danish West Indian Islands' future might fare in the same way as Porto Rico. That island had up to the present been kept outside of the American tariff limit, and its economical situation was very bad. The President desired to give Porto Rico free trade, the Democratic party also, but the large sugar trust company opposed it as harmful to the interests of the company. After a long time an agreement was arrived at upon a basis of 15 per cent tariff, which compromise satisfied none of the parties.

I had in the beginning of March a meeting with Mr. Bryan, the Democratic party's candidate to the Presidency. Mr. Bryan had made a number of political speeches in the different large cities in America, and came also to Philadelphia. He agitated especially against McKinley's imperialistic policy, and I was afraid that he might oppose the purchase of the Danish West Indies. Mr. C. W. Knox obtained for me a meeting with Mr. Bryan in a train between Baltimore and Philadelphia. I had a ten minutes' conversation with him, and secured his assurance that he would not oppose the sale. Mr. Bryan considered the purchase of the islands as a military strategic necessity which had nothing whatever to do with politics.

That evening, in a speech before the Philadelphia Democratic Club, Mr. Bryan confirmed his position as regards that question. He said he would always fight against imperialism and militarism, which he considered as synonymous; and said he could always sympathize with a peaceful extension, and especially a rounding off of the Republic within our own waters, as that was specially to protect our own coasts and islands. Together with the discussions about the Porto Rico tariff was the Nicaragua Canal treaty. Mr. Hay and the English ambassador, Pauncefoot, had signed the treaty according to which the proposed Nicaragua Canal could not be fortified. That angered a large portion of the Americans, and there was a strong sentiment against Mr. Hay.

I mention this question because, like the Porto Rico tariff, it touched the fate of the Danish Islands. While the Democrats demanded that the Nicaragua Canal should be fortified, the Republicans, with Senator Lodge in the lead, insisted that that was not necessary, since the canal could be protected from the islands lying about, by establishing strong naval stations in the right places. Not one but many times came the advocates of the treaty back to this point, and showed how the canal could be protected on the west from some islands in the Pacific; on the east from the Danish Islands. I have in my scrapbook numerous articles from the papers touching on this question, and it is quite remarkable to see how the American politicians already at that time looked upon the Danish Islands as the best place to establish American fortifications.

It would of course have been of great value to me to have been kept informed of what took place in Denmark regarding the island affair, but I never heard a word beyond a few scattered newspaper articles. In the beginning of March, however, I received a letter from Mr. Hagemann, and by reading that I first began to realize that opposition to the sale might be found in Denmark. I knew, however, that the Danish Government had formally agreed to a transfer to the United States Government, and since I had received no command to stop my work I simply continued.

I have never known what during that time took place in Denmark regarding the sale beyond what a few Congressmen told me.

It is sure that the Danish Government would not have found any difficulty in putting the affair through, since in America at least, no material opposition would have appeared. In Congress there was a majority for obtaining the islands. The Administration desired that extension of the United States. The military department demanded outright the islands as necessary for the country's security, and all the papers of any importance over the whole Union had expressed themselves as favoring the affair. The only dangerous opponents, viz, Rogers and his friends, had been brought to silence.

I dare here express, without in any way running the risk of being criticised for self-praise, that all of this favorable situation for the affair which, by the way still exists, is the direct result of my own work, and it is far from that this work had been made easy for me since, on the contrary, great oppositions had been placed in the way by the syndicate, by the Danish minister, yes, and not the least, by the Danish prime minister.

It is therefore not without a feeling of bitterness that I, on the 13th of March, wrote the prime minister:

"With this I could terminate my communication, but I consider it my duty to add some remarks which will assist in giving your excellency a fair comprehension as to how my position has been over here since I last left Denmark. Your excellency did me the honor at one of our meetings to inform me that you had written a lengthy letter to the Danish minister in Washington; informed him as to the progress of the affair, and as to my early return to America. I had absolute reason to believe that that communication from your excellency should serve me as a sort of an official credential, so that I not only would be able to count upon the assistance of the minister in the interest of the affair, but should also be in a position to give to my banker in New York a semi-official confirmation that he had been accepted by the Danish Government, since such a confirmation should have taken place through a personal meeting between the minister and the chief of the house of I. & W. Seligman & Co.

"As I have previously had the honor to inform your excellency, Mr. Brun would scarcely admit that he had received the letter referred to. He would only look upon me as a chance tourist. Nor has it in any way assisted me that Mr. Brun's conception of me and my position was transplanted to the foreign minister in Washington, where previously I have been treated with much regard and confidence. Mr. Brun's treatment of me has caused me an endless amount of worry and difficulty, which I shall not further elaborate upon. It must be permitted, with all due consideration, that I express my surprise that I have thus been obliged without avail to seek assistance in this important affair, which both your excellency and a large portion of the Danish people desire to have terminated as quickly as possible. It has now for nearly three years been clear both to your excellency and to the committee of the highest Danish patriots, which was formed for the purpose of accomplishing the sale of the Danish West Indian Islands, that such a political action could not be put through in America without paying a large sum of money.

"I can, after my experience, absolutely confirm that conception as being right. Since no official representative of the Danish Government could undertake to administer the amount of money necessary for accomplishing the sale, a private person had to do it, and it became my task to accomplish that unpleasant and by no means easy task; but from difficult it became almost impossible for me, since I had neither cash money nor guaranties to offer the persons whom it was necessary to interest in the affair. I had, therefore, surely depended that I should have been able to use a banker as guarantor for the sums I had to offer in case the affair was accomplished, but in that regard I had not been backed up from home."

That communication I was obliged to dictate to my wife while lying in bed ill from nervousness and provocation over the treatment which I had received from the prime minister.

From private letters and newspaper articles from Denmark, and especially after receiving the supreme court lawyer Salomon's telegram, I understood that a sentiment against the sale of the islands was springing up in Denmark; also that Horrings's ministry would soon be dissolved. I decided, therefore, to return home as soon as Privatbanken's reply to Seligman's should arrive, because upon that I based my last hope that the prime minister would keep his promise to recognize the banker.

The reply arrived, as already stated, early in April, and with that my last hope was banished.

The Danish Rigsdag would soon close, and in the American Congress the coming Presidential campaign had already begun to absorb all interest. Hence it was easily recognizable that the sale of the islands could not be terminated before the next Congress—that is, after the 4th of December, 1900.

I had already in several letters and reports, for example, in my letter to Etatsraad G. Hansen, on 19th February—expressed this eventuality, and I had even advised sooner to wait the summer over, as thereby it might be possible to increase the sum $1,000,000.

Before I left America, however, it was of the highest importance that I should come to a definite understanding with Rogers and Gron, as I did not dare to leave the country with those two as enemies.

I attempted, therefore, again to get Gron to agree to a compromise, but that was very difficult. He and Rogers evidently did not think there was any possibility that the sale of the islands would take place before the following session, and it was then their intention to manage with me out, so that they themselves, assisted by their friends in Copenhagen, could arrange the latter in accordance with their own interests.

To that I was naturally opposed, since I had not only done a great and important work in the matter and sacrificed a large sum of money in trying to accomplish it, but I had also to consider other persons who had rendered me much assistance both in Congress and in the press, and those persons would without doubt, if they saw their demands neglected and their interests threatened, work just as strongly against the affair as they had before for it.

For about a fortnight I had worked in New York to the end of arriving at a compromise, but did not succeed. In the meantime I was notable, from pecuniary reasons, to remain longer in New York. I was absolutely obliged to depart before I became so reduced that I should not be able to pay my passage home for my wife and myself. An attempt to secure money from Denmark through Mr. Hagemann failed.

I could therefore see no other means, in my difficult position, than to compel Gron to compromise. My feelings toward him and Rogers were not of the kindest, since they had done me all the harm they could and had not been select in their choice of weapons.

Before I did anything I sought Mr. Gron and informed him of my decision. These transactions with Gron and Rogers had to come to an end, and if they would not willingly accept my offer, which, in generosity, was much greater than the two gentlemen could expect or demand, then I would in one of New York's largest papers make public their opposition to me in the island affair, their misuse of the press, etc.; in short, scandalize them to such a degree as they for months had tried to scandalize me. My offer to Gron consisted in that he and Rogers during their present session of Congress should have half of the commission, but if the islands first were sold during the coming winter session they could have two-thirds and one-third of the commission. The day after Gron sent to me a refusal of the offer.

I then went to the editor in chief of the World, Colonel Vanbenheisen, and made him acquainted with my difficult situation. He understood immediately, and offered to assist me. I gave Mr. Vanbenheisen a short account of the whole affair of my relations with Rogers and Gron, handed over to him a number of letters, telegrams, and other documents, and made him promise that he would publish nothing without my permission. Advocate Fischer-Hansen was witness to our conversation, which he, by the way, himself had brought about, since he personally knew Colonel Vanbenheisen.

My intention was not to have anything made public, since that would only produce scandal, without any way furthering the affair. I only wished to frighten Gron, and especially Rogers.

I must here explain that no paper can make public an article giving names of persons without first presenting such an article's head points and assertions. In such a case the editor sends some one to the person and presents him a résumé of the article's contents, and allows the person to protest against it if he wishes. Those press conditions had been explained to me by Fischer-Hansen, and upon that I had built my hopes of being able to force Rogers to give in when he should see that there was danger that I would actually follow up my threats. Besides, I must explain that the World is especially feared by the large trust companies, which the paper fights with all its power, as detrimental to the middle class. Mr. Rogers is, besides, the very blackest sheep in all the trusts, since he is the most inconsiderate operator, with the enormous fortune of the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. Vanbenheisen kept his promise, sent a reporter to Mr. Rogers, and afterwards to Mr. Gron, and the result was the desired one. The day after Gron, in his own and Rogers's name, signed a contract with me, after which half of the sum should fall to him and Rogers if the islands were sold during the present session, two-thirds if the sale took place during the coming winter session. As soon as the contract was signed, Mr. Fischer-Hansen secured me back all my papers, letters, etc., from Colonel V., who kept his word and never made public a line of what I had given him in confidence.

That affair was therefore, in my opinion, out of the world when I returned to Denmark, but unfortunately there awaited me an afterplay. About three weeks after my departure the paper, New York Times, published a long article against Rogers in connection with his relation to the sale of the islands.

A part of that article has been published in the Politikan, and I have answered it. It was not clear to me from where the article originated and who had inspired it. I had left no material behind. In the beginning I thought that it was from the foreign minister, to break a possible opposition in the Senate to the island sale. The minister of war held warlike speeches, in which he demanded the islands. Now he is believed to understand better, but what it all is about he can not be blamed more than the man who has fallen as an offer for thieves and bandits. Gron has here in this country blamed Fischer-Hansen as the author.

Before I left Fischer-Hansen desired to be liberated from some of the obligations he had given as guarantor of my contracts, and I complied with his desire, so much the more as I had never wished to make use of his help. I was only compelled to do so by circumstances, because I set the affair over all personal wishes and considerations.

Those persons and press associations who previously were my assistants are still. I have reduced the different sums of which I am now the only guarantor in such a way that I can now manage to get along with a third of the commission promised me. That I did in order to be able to give the gentlemen, Rogers and Gron, the large amount—two-thirds of the 10 per cent commission—which they demanded.

After my return to Denmark I applied to the chief of department Schlichtkrull and requested him to inquire of the prime minister when I could secure an audience. The minister asked me to call the day after, and I met.

I had not seen the minister since my departure from Denmark in January, and it was in a bitter frame of mind that I again entered the minister's reception room in the ministry of finance. I had in the meantime worked to such a degree that my nerves were almost ruined and my means entirely exhausted. I had not saved myself, but thrown my whole energy into the affair, which the minister had shown such a lively interest for. In return the minister had done nothing for me. He had broken his promises and agreements, even to such a degree that he had proven untrue to me and had made it appear that I had made myself impossible for the minister's confidence. (See prime ministers letter to Salomon.)

The audience terminated for both parties in a very unpleasant manner, and my bitterness and anger ran away with me, and I reproached the minister for his failure to keep his word and remain loyal to me.

The minister admitted that perhaps in his letter to Salomon he had expressed himself too strongly. When I asked him if he had had anything to reproach me for, he answered no.

I permitted myself to make it clear to him how he, by refusing to back me up, had made it possible for Mr. Brun to drive me out of Washington; how I had there only worked according to the agreement between myself and the minister, but had been left in the lurch, had been made suspicious, and mocked; how the minister had been the fault of making my best friends in America, such as Seligman and Senator Lodge, look upon me with suspicion; how I had been jeered at in Denmark, and called various names, etc., without the minister having done anything toward assisting me; on the contrary, he had betrayed me and disavowed me each time he found an opportunity. I asked the minister to think it all over, and requested urgently that he should secure for me satisfaction. His excellency had only this reply—that it was not in his power to give me any satisfaction; that he only had a couple more days to remain minister in.

CONCLUSION.

I have above given a detailed and accurate account of my work in the island affair. How that evolves itself in the future I do not know, but I permit myself here to establish the absolutely undeniable fact that it is I and my personal work that is the cause of the Americans' interest in the islands and their desire to buy them.

[Here a page is lost.]

Justice and to the enlightenment of all the relations upon which I base this desire is this: That I have permitted myself to trouble the high Government with this presentation of my work in the affair in question.

With the highest obedience,

W. CHRISTMAS DIRCKINCK HOLMFELDT.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12804.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HEMENWAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12804.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Virginia was to have twenty-five minutes' debate on the bill.

Mr. HAY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULL. I hardly think that was the agreement. I submit to my friend from Virginia if that was not with the understanding that he was to discuss the bill, and that he was not quite ready to proceed with his remarks yesterday. That was the understanding, was it not?

Mr. HAY. I did not so understand. I wanted forty-five minutes; and I say to the gentleman from Iowa that I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, and then I will not take any time myself.

Mr. HULL. It was not a question of time; it is a question of the understanding that was made. If the gentleman will say that that was not his understanding, of course I will raise no objection.

Mr. HAY. I do not want you to have any misunderstanding.

Mr. HULL. Well, I will leave it to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. I am between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from New York. I do not want to do anything discourteous to either one. I do not propose to make any remarks myself. I just yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULL. Go ahead.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon I sent to the Clerk's desk an article from the Philadelphia North American dated March 14, 1902, which I desired to have read. At that time it was objected to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK]. I now send to the Clerk the same paper to have the article read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From Philadelphia North American, March 14, 1902.]

REPRESENTATIVE SULZER INTRODUCES A BILL INTENDED TO REFORM PRESENT TARIFF LAW—AIMS BLOW AT SUGAR TRUST—WOULD REMOVE COLOR RESTRICTION AND OPEN MARKET TO CUBAN PRODUCERS.

[By Angus McSweeney.]

WASHINGTON, March 13, 1902.

The North American's exposure of sugar-trust methods is having its effect.

Representative SULZER, of New York, to-day introduced in the House a bill to amend the present tariff law by striking from the sugar schedule the provision that all sugars above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, shall pay a duty of 1½ cents a pound.

This action was based directly upon the statements in the North American of Tuesday showing the enormous protection given the sugar trust by the color restriction in the tariff law and the palpable deception practiced by Congress, both by its insertion in the law and by its retention there.

As its author is a member of the Democratic minority, Mr. SULZER's bill will be scoffed at by the members of the Ways and Means Committee, but it will serve as a beginning of the investigation which should be demanded by the country, and which should lead to favorable action upon the bill as soon as the purposes aimed at are generally understood.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

The bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and it is before that committee now. Mr. SULZER expects to obtain his first hearing and a hearing also for the witnesses he will produce to testify in behalf of his proposition.

Except by reports of the trust interests, it is not easy to see how objections to the bill can be successfully argued. It proposes no reduction in the rates of duty established by existing law upon sugar according to its grade of purity, and leaves the duty of 1½ cents a pound upon refined sugar, but eliminates the color restriction and opens the way to the sugar producers of Cuba to send their highest grades of sugar to the United States for sale in the markets in competition with sugar-trust products.

Of course, the measure will be opposed by the trust and by all trust advocates in Congress, but there is no sentiment outside the two legislative Chambers in favor of trust privileges, and sooner or later SULZER's proposition will be accepted. The North American has aroused the spirit of inquiry, and nothing more is needed to expose the trick by which the trust has secured absolute control of the sugar market. Mr. SULZER said to-day respecting his measure:

"Everyone must admit that the whole usefulness of the Dutch standard lies in the fact that, first, it forces the planters to sell exclusively to the trust, and second, of course, it forces the people to buy exclusively of the trust. It is merely a means of assuring to the trust an absolute monopoly in the sugar business. The Cubans, who would be glad to market their sugars direct and pay the higher duties, which will be required according to a really scientific test, are unable to do so, and the people of the United States, who would be glad to buy their sugar direct from the producers, are unable to do so."

"Ingenuity of man could not have devised a more perfect and admirable method of securing for a limited number of capitalists an absolute monopoly of an important article of food than this one which lies hidden in that apparently innocent color restriction. It helps nobody but the trust, it keeps the planters poor, and it robs the people. All this can be easily proved, and that is what I purpose to do. It was because I was certain of it that I introduced the bill."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the article just read is from one of the most fearless, one of the most honest, and one of the greatest Republican newspapers in this country, the Philadelphia North American. The article speaks for itself. I have had it read from the Clerk's desk so that it will be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I hope that every member of this House will take the trouble to read it.

The article clearly, fully, and intelligently tells the purpose of the bill I introduced in this House on the 13th day of this month. The bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee by the Speaker, and I request, and indulge the hope, that it will ere long be favorably reported.

Let me reiterate what I have frequently said before on this floor, that I am now, always have been, and always will be a friend of Cuba and of the Cubans. The record will show that ever since I have been a member of this House I have done all in my power for the Cuban people. I am glad the bright day is not far distant when the Cuban Republic will take her place among the nations of the earth. May success, happiness, prosperity, and domestic tranquillity abide with her hereafter forever, is my fervent prayer. [Applause.]

The time is at hand, nevertheless, when we must live up to our sacred obligations to Cuba. We must grant her the freedom and the independence promised. We must launch this young Republic of Cuba on the ocean of nations and say to all the world, Cuba is free and independent. We must say to every nation, She is our creation—a daughter of the great Republic—and any interference with her will be an act unfriendly to the Government of the United States.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. We must now grant her immediate trade relief. In a commercial way she is at our mercy. That is not her fault—it is our fault. Congress has made it practically impossible for Cuba to market her products in other countries; they must be sold here, and they can not be sold in this country at present except at a ruinous loss, unless our tariff law is repealed or modified. This must be done at once—it should have been done months ago. If it is not speedily done I predict that conditions in Cuba will soon be worse than they ever were before. The situation is serious and admits of no further delay. The people want Congress to act.

The Republican party is responsible for the deplorable commercial condition now existing in Cuba. The Republican party, wedded to its high protective-tariff policy, would apparently rather witness the starvation of the Cubans than consent to reduce to a slight degree for Cuba its present system of outrageous tariff taxes. What a spectacle of commercial selfishness, monopolistic greed, and political shortsightedness the Republican party presents to day! We have been in session here since the first Monday of last December, and nothing has been done to afford relief to the Cubans.

The President, the Secretary of War, General Wood, President-elect Palma, and every person familiar with the present situation in Cuba have urged Congress to reduce the existing tariff taxes on Cuban exports to this country at least 50 per cent. But nothing has been done. The Republican leaders can not agree, the Ways and Means Committee will not act, and the industrial arm of Cuba is becoming paralyzed. I predict that if this selfish policy is continued much longer the doctrine of Republican protection will soon be destroyed by its foolish worshippers.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of doing something now to avert calamity in Cuba. I want to see Cuba free and happy and prosperous. I will vote for any measure to reduce the present tariff duties between this country and Cuba. In my judgment we should have free trade with Cuba. It would be beneficial to us and advantageous to the Cubans. It would help the people of both countries.

But I say now, and it must be apparent to anyone who gives the subject consideration, that if relief comes by tariff reduction the present duties must be reduced at least one-half. Anything less in this line will be useless and futile, and Cuba will go back to a condition of commercial stagnation that will cost us dearly in the end, and the fault will be all our own.

In the last three years the balance of trade has been over $30,000,000 against the island. Her people have exhausted their resources in a heroic struggle to build up their industries, but they can not go on spending more than they receive any longer, and this year's sugar crop, which will be over 800,000 tons, represents their supreme effort, and unless relief comes—and comes quickly—we must expect a crisis which will render Cuba's position most deplorable and ours most embarrassing.

A mere handful of protected beet growers and cane growers, who care nothing for Cuba, nothing for the millions of American sugar consumers, are the only obstructors of this nation's good will to the people of Cuba. The American people expect Congress to grant relief, and to grant it quickly.

When the Congress adopted the so-called Platt amendment, which I voted against, and which in my judgment never should have been adopted, it took an unfair advantage of Cuba; but when that amendment finally became a law, the Cuban people accepted it in good faith, and, at our request, wrote it into their constitution. By virtue of that amendment Cuba is commercially helpless to-day, and unable to make treaties of a commercial character to market her products. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that it is now incumbent on this Government to grant some trade relief to Cuba by which her products can be admitted into this country and sold without a loss. At present this can not be done.

The cost of raising sugar in Cuba is 2.6 cents per pound. The selling price of sugar, duty paid, in New York is now 3.75 cents. The Dingley duty is 1.68½ cents per pound, or nearly 100 per cent of its value on the plantation in Cuba. It plainly appears, therefore, that Cuba can only sell her staple crop in New York at a loss, and can not sell it anywhere else. There is now about $20,000,000 worth of sugar cane standing in Cuba, and if the Dingley blockade against it is not raised it might as well be left to rot on the ground.

Governor-General Leonard Wood, pleading for a speedy reciprocal arrangement, insists that this country has nothing to lose and much to gain thereby. Our domestic production of sugar is about 450,000 tons; in the annexed and protected islands, Cuba included, about 1,000,000 tons more are grown, and from Europe we buy about 800,000 tons besides. One-fifth of all the sugar the American people use must come from outside. Cuba's total product, even if it were greatly increased, could not possibly make us independent of Europe.

Now, sir, if I could have my way regarding the matter I would strike down every tariff barrier between the Republic of Cuba and the United States. If something is not quickly done by Congress that will be the solution. The leaders of the Republican party have been quarreling day in and day out regarding this question. I am now informed and believe they have reached an agreement by which they are willing to reduce the existing tariff duties 20 per cent on sugar and tobacco. That according to the President, the Secretary of War, General Wood, President Palma, of the Cuban Republic, and others competent to testify, will do absolutely no good. If there is going to be any reduction of the tariff law, the reduction must be 50 per cent or more in order to help the Cubans.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words regarding my bill to remove the color restriction on unrefined sugar coming from Cuba. I introduced the bill in good faith, and I intend to do all in my power to pass it. It is a good bill, and should become a law. There should be no opposition to it, and to some extent it will solve the present difficulty by permitting the Cuban planters to market their unrefined sugar product immediately in this country. That will afford some relief at once.

If the color restriction on Cuban unrefined sugar should be removed, it would not materially injure the beet-sugar growers nor the cane-sugar growers of this country, but it would benefit immediately the Cuban planters and furnish to the people of this country cheaper and better sugar.

At present, on account of this color restriction, put in the law by the sugar trust, every pound of unrefined sugar that comes from Cuba to this country must be sold to the sugar trust, and it must be sold to the trust at the trust's own price. If this bill to remove that restriction should become a law, the Cuban sugar planters, if they were unable to sell to the sugar trust, could market their product and sell it to grocers and consumers in competition with the sugar trust.

The only legitimate opposition to this bill must therefore come from the sugar trust, in order to control the product, dictate the price, and stifle competition. When this question is understood, I am satisfied every friend of the people, every foe of monopoly, and every believer in commercial justice will favor the bill.

Now, sir, I do not say this bill is all that is necessary at the present time, but I do say, and I challenge successful contradiction, that it is a step in the right direction, and will afford immediate relief not only to the tariff-taxed Cuban producer, but also to the trust-taxed American consumer.

The color restriction on sugar is a device of the sugar trust and was put in the Dingley high protective tariff law at the instigation of the sugar trust, to give it a monopoly in this country on refined sugars. Remove the color restriction and the higher grade Cuban sugars can be put on the American market at once and sold in competition with the refined sugars of the trust.

At present the color restriction on sugar in the law forces the producers of Cuban sugar to sell to the trust at the price fixed by the trust, and compels the consumers in America to buy from the trust at the price dictated by the trust. The trust controls the product and fixes the price to suit itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to get this matter before the House. I have done so briefly. At some future time I shall discuss this question more fully and at greater length. This color restriction for monopoly will have to go. The Republican party must repeal it or admit it stands for monopoly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated shall be disbursed and accounted for by the Pay Department as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. HULL. Under instruction of the committee, I move to amend by inserting after the word "appropriated," in line 25, page 14, the words "for pay of the Army and miscellaneous."

Allow me to explain, Mr. Chairman, that in the making up of this bill for the last four or five years several items have gotten into the first part of the bill (following the lines of the estimate) that are not under the control of the Pay Department. This amendment should be adopted for the purpose of keeping distinct what belongs to the Pay Department and what belongs to other branches of the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regular supplies: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, including their care and protection, consisting of stoves and heating apparatus required for heating offices, hospitals, barracks, and quarters, and recruiting stations; also ranges and stoves and appliances for cooking and serving food, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; of fuel and lights for enlisted men, including recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, and offices, and for sale to officers; and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries; for the necessary furniture, text-books, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; of forage in kind for the horses, mules, and oxen of the Quartermaster's Department at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; of straw for soldiers' bedding, and of stationery, including blank books for the Quartermaster's Department, certificates for discharged soldiers, blank forms for the Pay and Quartermaster's Department's, and for printing department orders and reports, $5,500,000; Provided, That no part of the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department shall be expended on printing unless the same shall be done by contract after due notice and competition, except in such cases as the emergency will not admit of the giving notice of competition; and in cases where it is impracticable to have the necessary printing done by contract the same may be done, with the approval of the Secretary of War, by the hire of the necessary labor for the purpose: Provided further, That hereafter, except in cases of emergency or where it is impracticable to secure competition, the purchase of all supplies for the use of the various departments and posts of the Army and of the branches of the Army service shall only be made after advertisement, and shall be purchased where the same can be purchased the cheapest, quality and cost of transportation and the interests of the Government considered; but every open-market emergency purchase made in the manner common among business men which exceeds in amount $300 shall be reported for approval to the Secretary of War under such regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. HULL. By the instruction of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "bakeries," in line 23, page 17, insert the following: "for ice machines and their maintenance, where required for the health and comfort of the troops in the insular possessions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I was very much interested in the very just and glowing tribute paid yesterday to the valor of American soldiers by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK], and I have been even more interested in the table of casualties—as inserted in this morning's RECORD—that were sustained by the various armies on both sides in the great struggle between the North and the South.

I come, as you are aware, sir, from the Old North State, which has for its motto Esse quam videre. That motto expresses a striking characteristic of our people, but the modesty of North Carolina will never permit her interests to suffer, when her sons are apprised of an occasion when even unintentionally she is deprived of her merited glory. She was the next to the last State to go into and form the present Union; and yet so devoted was she to it that when she once gave her heart and hand to it she was the last State to reluctantly withdraw from it. And when she, with sorrow, decided to break away from the old Union, she dedicated her all to the new Confederacy, and became the first to lose the life of a son, at Bethel, and was the last to lay down her arms, at Appomattox. And, sir, she contributed more soldiers to the lost cause than did any one of her sisters. But she accepts the arbitrament of war, and now vies with her sisters in her loyalty and devotion to her first love, but treasures with pride and sacred reverence the conspicuous part she bore in the "lost cause."

In the table of statistics that the gentleman gives will be found that he put at the head a Texas regiment as having sustained the greatest loss during the war. Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that the regiment that sustained the greatest casualties in deaths and wounds in that great battle of Gettysburg was the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment, which lost 90 per cent of its men and its gallant colonel, Harry Burgwyn; and the Second North Carolina Battalion took into that great engagement 200 men, of whom there was not one who was not killed or wounded.

In all history, Mr. Chairman, from Plataea and Marathon to Spion Kop, there is nothing to equal it for courage and endurance; and that the future historian may not omit from the records of time this brilliant achievement, never before equaled in the world's history, I simply refer to this well-established fact to-day in order that he may make up an accurate account of the valor of our troops in that great and sanguinary struggle and give the proper credit to the modest but great State that I have the honor to represent and love so well.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters for troops, storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, for offices, recruiting stations, and for the hire of buildings and grounds for summer cantonments, and for temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same, $3,000,000: Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or for quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster's Department, including those paid from the funds appropriated for regular supplies, incidental expenses, barracks and quarters, Army transportation, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee paid therefrom shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. ROSE, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 171. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KERN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the conclusion of the paragraph just read insert the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of War be instructed to authorize the reestablishment and restoration of the Army canteen as it existed under the rules in force previous to its abolition by Congress: And be it further provided, That the provisions of all acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

Mr. HULL. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation and not in order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment evidently changes existing law, and is therefore subject to a point of order. The Chair sustains the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, to be expended in the discretion of the President, and to be immediately available, $1,500,000; and the President is directed to report a detailed statement of the expenditure of this sum to each session of Congress until the entire appropriation is expended.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy only a moment. In my judgment this item, under the rules of the House, belongs upon the sundry civil bill and not upon the Army appropriation bill. But I have not deemed it proper to make a point of order upon it because I apprehend that the appropriation ought to be made. I call attention to the matter now merely for the purpose of preventing this being cited in the future as a precedent.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the appropriation embraced in this paragraph is in addition to the $500,000 heretofore appropriated for the same purpose in the urgent deficiency bill. Of course it is a necessary appropriation and I have no word of opposition to offer to it. But I wish to challenge the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this same item may be expected to appear in the Army appropriation bill at every session for an indefinite period in the future. The purpose to which the money will be devoted possesses great significance. This money will be expended in adding to the vast number of military posts scattered throughout the Philippines so thickly as to beleaguer the archipelago with American bayonets. These military posts tell the whole story. They typify the form of government under which henceforth the people of the islands must live.

I have said on this floor and I repeat it now that as long as we stay there we will dominate only the portion of the Philippine Islands commanded by the guns of our Army. Retire our soldiers and the people will reclaim their own and take possession of their country. I have forgotten the number of military posts now in existence in the islands, but it is a far greater number than ever existed on this continent. Without definite knowledge of statistics, I will venture to say that we now have in the Philippines a greater number of military posts than ever existed in the entire Western Hemisphere at any time in its history. This bill provides for more, and we will need them. In order to coerce the people into submission we must police the islands from one end to the other with soldiers. In order to compel respect for our authority the people must constantly look into the muzzles of our guns or see the gleam of our bayonets.

The gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, the Chief Executive, and some of the great newspapers assure the country that presently the Army will be withdrawn from the Philippines and that civil government will be instituted there. This done, they will tell us that a small force—ten or twelve or fifteen thousand soldiers—will suffice. They are deceiving themselves. Whatever its form or name, the government will rely upon the military for support. It will be a government of force, a government at variance with every principle of the American Constitution, a government at variance with every idea of the American people, a government such as American orators and American writers have from the foundation of our Government down to this hour denounced as infamous, because it will not rest upon the consent of the people. There are probably 5,000,000 Christians in that island. In order to justify the policy of our Government they are continually represented as barbarians.

Even if they were barbarians, would that justify us in crossing an ocean to subjugate them and despoil them of their country; to say that wherever a barbarous people may be found an American squadron and an American army shall be sent forth to conquer the country? But the Christian Filipinos are not barbarians. They are not our equals as a race nor in intelligence. The Malay can never approach the attainments of the great races of Europe and the North American Continent. Probably they can never have a government like ours.

Every government is a reflection of the intelligence and capacity of the people who are its subjects. Establish whatever government you may over any people, and in the long run it will be no better than the people themselves. The form of government, its methods, and its efficiency depend upon the people themselves. The Philippine Islanders, I assert again, as I have asserted frequently on this floor, had a better government than most countries have before we interfered with them. Withdraw our armies tomorrow and they will have a better government than we can give them. They will have a government capable of protecting life and property and guaranteeing the peace of the citizens.

After over two years of active campaigning, during which our Army has created a reign of terror in the island of Luzon, destroying the habitations of the people, laying waste the country, terrorizing the inhabitants, and now you say the country is pacified. I said yesterday, and I repeat it, terrorized is the word. The people have been terrorized into submission, but not pacified. Now, in order to retain what has been won by the use of fire and sword, we must build barracks and garrisons there with soldiers as a constant admonition to the Filipinos that resistance is hopeless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I would ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to print his remarks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; let him have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. I shall not object to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am exceedingly obliged to the gentleman from Iowa for not objecting. The gentleman asks that my remarks be printed. They will be printed, and more remarks of the same kind will be printed, not only at this session, but at future sessions of Congress, because more appropriations of the same kind will be asked. The War Department will be here at the next session asking more millions to build more fortresses, to establish more outposts in the Philippines. As long as we remain in the Philippine Islands, at session after session we will be compelled to make these appropriations. Congress must appropriate this money, because nobody here desires to deprive the soldiers in that island of anything necessary to their comfort, and I see no reason to expect a reduction in the amount demanded from year to year. I am one of the number who believe that it is better to keep a large army there than a small one if we are to retain in our hands permanently the government of this distant foreign country. Then at the very outset let us accept the responsibility and discharge it without flinching.

We must do as England has done in her colonies. We must keep in the islands constantly a sufficient number of soldiers to strike terror to the hearts of those people and hold them in unquestioning submission to our authority.

It is futile and hopeless, it is spitting in the face of all history, to expect that we can secure acquiescence in our government of the islands in any other way.

Gentlemen talk about pacifying the country. They were talking in this same strain two years ago. Long, long before General Otis left Manila he reported that the islands were just about pacified. Others who have gone there in official capacity, and still others who have gone there to be entertained and wine and dined at military headquarters in Manila while writing for American newspapers and magazines, have said: "The war is over and the country is pacified." Then in ten or twelve days afterwards we have heard of skirmishes in the very suburbs of Manila.

Recently, after having read reports and statements from all kinds of official and unofficial sources that the war in the Philippines had been terminated, that there were nothing but a few bands of robbers and marauders in the field, it became necessary for General Bell to issue an order sweeping 16,000 people into one concentration camp and 9,000 into another. So desperate was the situation that one of our commanders adopted the very tactics of Weyler in Cuba and of Kitchener in South Africa, and cleared a wide area of its inhabitants. Strange, is it not, that such drastic measures should be deemed necessary after we have been told over and over again, even in President's messages, that the Philippine war is over.

Only one course is left open to us. We must restore the country to its people or keep a force there strong enough to fairly gridiron the country with military roads and punctuate it at frequent intervals with military outposts. Thus we can hold the people in subjection. It can be done in no other way.

As I have said before, this appropriation will have to be made. So will another be necessary next year and the year after, and when we get through what will we have to show for the outlay? We may benefit a few Americans who want to get rich quickly without work, exploiting the natural resources of the Philippine Islands. We may help promoters of all kinds of fanciful corporations organized to develop gold mines, quarries, coal mines, and forests. All the various resources of the islands may be, and probably will be, seized and appropriated by speculators, to the end that a few men may get rich, or make the effort; meantime the American taxpayer will foot the bill. No American boy will ever go there to get a farm. Few Americans will ever go there to seek employment. No man can go there and, in that pestilential climate, make his home and rear his family. No Americans will expatriate themselves for the purpose of going into a country the inhabitants of which are citizens of nowhere, with no sovereign except the bayonet, and owing allegiance to no country that has a name in history.

At the outset we were compelled to outlaw those islands. They are not a part of our nation. They are not a nation. Where, then, is their allegiance? When a Filipino boy arrives at the age of manhood, where shall he address the devotions of a patriot? To the United States? He is not a citizen of the United States! To the Philippine Islands? They have been blotted out as an entity by the American Government.

Build your outposts, quarter your army there, go on with this scheme of conquest and spoliation, but let it be understood distinctly that you are carrying out a permanent policy.

Every gentleman on the other side of the Chamber has reached the conclusion long ago that military force must be the permanent basis of government in the Philippine Islands, but the Republican leaders have not dared to say so to the country. We all know that there is not in the islands any class of people who are loyal to our Government, but that on the contrary the inhabitants are united in opposition to our sovereignty. The pretense that any considerable number of them are loyal to our flag must be abandoned. There are no loyal Filipinos. The country is committed irrevocably to the policy of military despotism in the Antipodes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]
